City attorney issues opinion on vehicle contracts

By Sandra L. Medearis

Rolland Trowbridge cannot be denied a contract to repair the City's emergency vehicles because the location of his shop may go against 2008 zoning regulations, according to the city attorney's opinion.

Denying him the work based on a zoning violation via the process of voting down a bid award resolution would deny Trowbridge the due process built into the zoning law.

That was the opinion of Patrick W. Munson, one of the City's attorneys from Boyd, Chandler and Fal-

At their June 25 meeting, the Nome Common Council voted down a resolution put forth by City Manager Josie Bahnke, awarding a repair contract for the City's emergency vehicles and light duty trucks to the low bidder TSR, owned by-Rolland Trowbridge.

The contract came up for approval at the June 10 meeting, but was jerked from the Council packet when another bidder, Matt Johnson of Nome Machine Works, submitted a timely bid protest.

Johnson, whose current contract to do the work expired June 24,

More funding for RFB secured

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Rasmuson Foundation has come through with a grant for $1.3 million to help fund the Richard Foster Building.

The City of Nome has between $16 million and $17 million for the building that is currently intended to house three entities— Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, Kegoayah Kozga Library and the Kawerak, Inc. Beringia Center of Culture and Science.

Planners have been putting their heads together to meet a remaining shortfall of $3 million to bring the design toward completion.

The Rasmuson Foundation money will help to span the gap to get to the $19 million required for project plans.

"This $1.3 million will go towards the Richard Foster Building to make it a place to accommodate all three facilities," John K. Handeland of the Nome Museum and Library Commission said on Sunday.

The money would help with tenant accommodations for the Kawerak program like shelving for exhibits, lights and electrical, walls, restrooms in the section and the development of a shell into a facility, he said.

Kawerak as a lease tenant plans to pay the City of Nome as a landlord, $115,500 per year for 3,300 sq. ft., which the City needs to offset operating costs for the building.

This means the funding shortfall has narrowed, with Kawerak ex-

Rasmuson Foundation staff tour regional communities

By Diana Haecker

Just as Rasmuson Foundation staff and one board member, Cathy Rasmuson, were touring the region last week, news reached Nome that the Rasmuson Board of Directors on Wednesday voted to award a $1.3 million grant towards Kawerak Inc.'s proposed Beringia Science and Cultural Center to be housed in the Richard Foster building.

Estimates to complete the construction of the building including the Beringia Center are $19 million.

The State Legislature appropriated $16 million. Instead of waiting if a match can be found, Rasmuson Foundation board members took the initiative and OK'd the $1.3 million to create a momentum that may inspire other organizations to chip in the balance.

To Nomeites, this came as a surprise. It was anticipated that the Rasmuson Foundation Board would not make a decision prior to their November meeting.

Rasmuson Foundation President and CEO Diane Kaplan told the Nome Nugget that staff recommended the board take up the issue in their June meeting and award the funds. And they did.

This marks the biggest Rasmuson Foundation grant awarded in the re-

Kaplan said the grant would at this juncture in time provide a momentum to help the project forward. According to Kaplan, the Rasmuson Foundation had been engaged in talks with the City of Nome and Kawerak Inc. ever since the idea came about to integrate the Beringia Science and Cultural Center into the Richard Foster building, which will house the City's Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum and the Kegoayah Kozga Library.

'Our thought was that it would make sense to consolidate the facilities in the Richard Foster Building," she said. "We support facilities that serve the broader community as we encourage an integrated society." Kaplan said that the foundation's mission is to function as a catalyst to promote a better life for Alaskans.

The word catalyst is key here." said Kaplan. She explained that the foundation besides awarding the

Letters -

Dear Editor:

To the Iditarod Trail Race Board of Directors:

I am writing this to you because I wonder what kind of instruction (direction) you, the Board of Directors, give your Executive Director Stan Hooley. It is extremely sad and frustrating to watch this event go down the drain year by year.

It once was spoken of as a World Class Event, but sadly to say not anymore. We have had a lot of Iditarod visitors and members come thru our home this past month of March— mushers and Iditarod visitors. Their main topic was: What's happening with the Iditarod, and why is this Board continuing to keep the current Executive Director Mr. Hooley?

It is not difficult to evaluate Stan Hooley as a very ineffective director. It is time to begin recruiting for a new director. Hopefully you can start rebuilding this great Event, The Last Great Race of the World, back to where it once was some years ago.

Sincerely Yours, Erna S. Rasmussen Nome, AK One of the Unsung, unnoticed Volunteers of the Iditarod - 1972-

Preface - We realize that living in Alaska comes with its share of wildlife encounters; however, the recent occurrence of musk-oxen taking up residence in the city limits of Nome is dangerous to humans and domestic pets. People should not have to live in fear for their lives, their families' lives and their pets' lives within the city limits. The musk oxen have never invaded the city in the way they have in recent

Oh sure, the residents of western Alaska are kept informed about what's happening in their back yard. Well, some folks are, most aren't. The State of Alaska spends big bucks to bring the bureaucrats, heads of industry and foreign mining companies to meet in rural Alaska, but they don't publicly announce the event, heck, they don't even post it on an obscure government web site.

Too many times the residents of western Alaska find out about an event after it happens. AIDEA recently had a meeting in Kotzebue about the road to the Ambler Mining District. They didn't notify the hoi polloi folks who live downstream the Kobuk River. The Alaska Arctic Policy Commission is funded by the state to set a policy for dealing with everything involved with the Arctic. They sit in Anchorage and teleconference their meeting. Do they notify folks about the listening session? Well, no. It seems they know what is best for us and there is a trend on the part of state and industry to do their business under the radar. The state makes no real effort to inform its citizens of actions that impact the economic, the cultural and the environmental aspects of our lives. We are treated as if we do not exist, as if our opinions do not matter, and as if we are ignorant. Nomeites remember how the Rock Creek Mine folks called us a "benighted" community? It did not mean that we were members of the British Royalty. It meant we were

It seems that our state government strives to keep its citizens in the dark so that it can make it easy for big industry to grab our resources. Some call this colonialism. Whatever it's called, it has to stop. However, it won't stop until we take control of the situation and use every means at our disposal to take the reins of government in our own hands. We need to demand responsible government and adequate public notice where everyone is informed, not just a select few.

EPA releases policy on climate change adaptation

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency released a new policy statement on climate change adaptation to help the nation to respond to the impacts of a changing climate. The policy commits the agency to work with states, tribes and local communities to increase their resilience to extreme weather events and prepare for the impacts of climate change.

The new policy updates the EPA policy and includes to modernize EPA's financial assistance program to encourage climate-resilient investments; provide information, tools, training and technical support for climate change preparedness and resilience; implement priority actions identified in EPA's Climate Change Adaptation Plan and Implementation Plans; focus on the most vulnerable people and places; measure and evaluate performance of climate adaptation actions; continue EPA planning for climate change-related risk; and coordinate with other federal agencies.

House passes bill to unlock NPR-A

The United States House of Representatives passed a number of bipartisan bills to expand the production of American energy resources across the country, including in the National Petroleum Reserve -Alaska.

The passage of H.R. 4899 is meant to open access to NPR-A. The bill passed the House by a vote of

In addition to requiring lease sales in the NPR-A, H.R. 4899 would require the Department of Interior to conduct added onshore and offshore oil and gas lease sales, including areas of the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas, reissue its five-year offshore leasing plan, make all coastal states eligible to receive offshore revenue sharing from federal energy leases and authorize a $50 million match to Governor Parnell's pledge to conduct a resource assessment of the Arctic National Wildlife Reserve.

NOAA delists humpback whale

NOAA Fisheries announced a positive 90-day finding on the State of Alaska's petition to designate the Central North Pacific stock of the endangered humpback whale as a Distinct Population Segment and delist it under the Endangered Species Act. Scientists estimate there are a minimum of 5,833 of this population, which migrates between Alaska and Hawaii. In the finding, NOAA Fisheries determined that the petition presents substantial scientific or commercial information indicating that the petitioned action may be warranted.

NOAA Fisheries received a petition from the State of Alaska on February 26, which argued that the Central North Pacific, or Hawaii, stock constitutes a Distinct Population Segment under the ESA. The petition asserts that this population has recovered to the point that it is no longer in danger of extinction, and meets the criteria for removal from the list of threatened and endangered

Under the ESA, a positive 90-day finding on such a petition requires the agency to conduct a status review for the species. NOAA Fisheries is already developing a status review of the humpback whale globally to review the status of the species, and is also reviewing a separate petition from the Hawaii Fishermen's Alliance for Conservation and Tradition to delist humpback whales throughout the North Pacific. NOAA Fisheries will incorporate consideration of the Alaska petition into the ongoing status review for humpback

To ensure this status review is comprehensive, the agency is soliciting scientific and commercial information regarding this species through a 30-day public comment period. The deadline to comment is July 28, 2014. Comments identified by FDMS Docket Number NOAA-NMFS-2014-0051 at the federal e-Rulemaking portal at www.regulations.gov. can be mailed to Jon Kurland, Assistant Regional Administrator for Protected Resources, NMFS Alaska Region, Attn: Ellen Sebastian, P.O. #### Tribes intervene in Pebble lawsuit

The Hill reports that a coalition of Alaska Native tribes will intervene to support the Environmental Protection Agency in a lawsuit challenging its authority to halt the Pebble Mine, a proposed copper and gold mine near Bristol Bay.

The United Tribes of Bristol Bay originally asked the EPA to block the permit for the proposed Pebble Mine using its authority under section 404(c) of the Clean Water Act. They announced that they will continue to fight against the project by joining Pebble's lawsuit against the EPA for initiating the permit veto process before an application was filed.

Alaska Gov. Sean Parnell entered the fray and joined the lawsuit on Pebble's behalf.

The tribes argue that mining and the disposal of waste would harm the local salmon population. The EPA's research confirmed the tribes' assertions, and earlier this year, the agency started the veto process, but did not fully deny the permit.

Researchers seek citizen scientists for northern plants project

Researchers heading two citizenscience projects are looking for participants. The climate in the north is changing rapidly. Spring arrives earlier, summers are warmer and fall arrives later. These changes affect the timing of plants' life events, such as leafing out, flowering, fruiting and dying- called plant phenology. 'Northern plants are programmed to shut down early, well before the light disappears or it turns cold," said Christa Mulder, project leader and a plant ecologist at the University of Alaska Fairbanks Institute of Arctic Biology. "If there's an extra month of summer, that's not a problem, but if non-native plants don't shut down at the same time as typical northern

In response to a letter to the editor last week, Harbormaster Lucas Stotts said gold dredges parked in the swimming and fishing zone on Belmont Point have been temporarily allowed to anchor there due to continuous dredging of the Snake River.

Stotts expects the dredging to last for two more weeks, during which time the gold dredges may have to park at the beach zone that is marked for the use of Belmont Point beach goers and kids to play, swim and fish.

The ultimate goal is to create a deep enough channel for gold dredges to anchor in the Snake River and on the west side of the shoreline.

As for traffic in and out of the harbor, Stotts reports the following:

On July 1, Delta Western's vessel Pacific Challenger departed after discharging fuel.

On July 2, the vessels Gretchen H/Seabeck arrived to load gravel. Crowley's tanker Atlantic Polaris and Pacific Freedom anchored offshore for fuel operations.

On July 3, Northland's tug and barge Polar Viking/Polar Trader arrived to discharge cargo. The Gretchen H/Seabeck departed after loading gravel. Northland's landing crafts Sam Taalak, Nunaniq and Greta arrived to load cargo. The tankers Atlantic Polaris and Pacific Freedom anchored offshore for Crowley.

On July 4, Northland's Polar Viking departed. Crowley tankers Atlantic Polaris and Pacific Freedom remained offshore. The Millie Cruz loaded armor rock at Cape Nome.

Crowley's tanker Point Thompson arrived to discharge fuel. Northland's vessel Nunaniq departed.

On July 5, Crowley's Nokea/Nakao arrived to discharge fuel to the Point Thompson. The Diane H/Kumtux arrived with freight. The tankers Atlantic Polaris and Pacific Freedom still parked offshore. Alaska Logistics' vessels Seahawk/Madison Rose arrived for cargo operations.

questioned Trowbridge's qualifications and adequacy of shop facilities to perform work on the costly ladder truck and emergency systems.

He wondered in his bid protest letter whether Trowbridge had a Commercial Driver's License. He was stating his concerns as Chief of Nome Volunteer Fire Dept., Johnson said in his letter.

Johnson's phone responded with voice mail on Monday, but City Clerk Tom Moran verified that a complaint had been filed concerning a zoning violation with use of 303 West C Street for auto repair and maintenance.

City of Nome was investigating that complaint on direction of the city attorney, Moran reported Monday.

The City's building inspector Gregg Smith was on the job as the city officer responsible for zoning concerns and enforcement.

"The building inspector will report findings to the city attorney, and the city attorney will decide the issue," Moran said. "The city administration is not going to be crucified for it."

Smith's work includes researching sales tax records, business licenses and utility service records to determine whether the site has continually been used as a vehicle repair facility, which would allow the current Trinity Sails and Repair - short TSR - use to be grandfathered in as a preexisting nonconforming use.

A two-year lapse in use as a vehicle repair shop would cause grandfather rights to expire, according to the zoning ordinance.

At the second Council go-around concerning Bahnke's recommendation for contract award to Trowbridge, he had met concerns regarding his qualifications. His certificates and a CDL met satisfaction of Bahnke who put Trowbridge's contract back on the table for Council approval on June 25.

Aha, said councilmembers— Trowbridge's shop at 303 West C Street is in a General Use Zone, which specifically forbids auto

"I don't feel comfortable awarding a contract to someone who is in violation of our City laws," said Councilman Tom Sparks.

Councilman Stan Andersen wanted Trowbridge to have more experience in the business before he would vote him a contract, he said.

Councilman Matt Culley began to pursue an argument that it wasn't the Council's business where Trowbridge was going to do the work.

"He might find another location to do the work. It's not ours to say," Culley said.

He asked if the bid specs required a successful bidder to have a properly zoned facility in which to perform the contract.

City Clerk Tom Moran was present at the meeting and said that the requirement was in the bid papers.

As it turned out, there was no mention of the zoning issue in the bid documents.

The Council unanimously voted down awarding the contract to Trowbridge.

According to an e-mailed response to Bahnke issued by Munson

According to an e-mailed response to Bahnke issued by Munson on July 1, there were two separate issues—the lowest responsible bidder and a zoning issue. Each had to be taken up on its own merits.

The City could issue the contract to Trowbridge, according to Munson.

"The only issue before the Council is whether to award the contract to Trinity Sails as recommended by the city manager. There is no zoning complaint [Now there is a complaint filed June 2.]. Even if there was, the zoning investigation would be entirely separate from the contract award process. Trinity Sails was determined to be the low bidder and qualified to perform the contract," Munson's memorandum said.

"Neither the RFP soliciting bids nor the City's code required compliance with zoning ordinances as a condition for bidding or for receiving the contract."

"Whether Trinity Sails is in compliance with City zoning laws is not relevant to whether it is qualified to perform the contract or whether the City can legally award the contract to Trinity Sails," Munson said.

"The City may award the contract to Trinity Sails whether or not a violation exists. The contract award decision is not the correct forum for determining whether a zoning violation exists," Munson wrote in his memorandum.

The location of Trinity Sails could be taken up if and when someone made a written complaint and filed it with the City per zoning conflict procedures.

At closing time at City Hall July 2, a complaint had been filed, according to Smith, the building inspector.

The Nome Planning Commission drew up the zoning regulations after working on them for several years and after the public had taken the opportunity to comment. The NPC passed the zoning law proposal up to Nome Common Council, which approved it in October 2008.

The General Use Zone allows a broad list of land uses—for example: single-family dwellings, duplex multiple-family dwellings, dwellings, mobile homes and mobile home parks, parks and playgrounds, churches, private storage excluding junk, small warehouses, retail and wholesale businesses, offices, restaurants, taverns, hospitals, clinics, small-scale manufacture, unreal home, personal service businesses, museums, rec centers, fire stations and emergency medical aid stations, daycare and helicopter landing pads.

The General Use, Residential, and Open Space/Rec zones do not allow vehicle and equipment repair.

That activity may take place in a Commercial Zone or a Resource Development Zone with a conditional permit from the Nome Planning Commission.

Vehicle and equipment repair are allowed in the Industrial Zone.

VISITING — Cathy Rasmuson, wife of Ed Rasmuson and board member of the Rasmuson family's foundation, chats with Paul "Bebucks" Ivanoff, in Koyuk, on June 26. pected to come up with additional money for fixtures, furniture and equipment for their Beringia program, Handeland said.

At first, Rasmuson Foundation declined the grant proposal, but then said they would provide funding on a "last-money-in" basis, meaning that Kawerak would have to find other money that Rasmuson Foundation would augment.

"Now they have decided to work with us," Handeland said.

Kawerak has pumped about $85,000 into design costs, according to Amy Russell-Jamgochian, Beringia project director who works for Kawerak, Inc.

Preparation work has begun at the site for the RFB that will go up at the north end of Steadman Street. The project will cover about 18,000 square feet, Handeland said.

And the additional money to bring funding to meet 100 percent design completion?

"We don't know yet, but other feelers are out for funding, Handeland said. "It is time to beat the bushes to make this Richard Foster Building happen."

City administration expects to have more news concerning funding available at the next Nome Common Council meeting on July 14, according to Josie Bahnke, city manager.

Beringia will exhibit the latest in circumpolar research, and display indigenous history in artifacts, and the many innovations of the people who have called Beringia home for thousands of years, according to Kawerak's plans.

plants, they may gain a foothold and out-compete native plants." The citizen-science projects are Flower-Trackers in Canada and Project BrownDown in Alaska. Changes in plant communities affect people directly by affecting when resources such as geese, caribou and berries are available.

"Kids in remote communities have few opportunities to participate in scientific research, yet they often know a lot about the environment they live in," said Mulder. "By participating in this project, they will learn how to analyze and display data, determine whether or not what they see can be explained by changes in climate and have an opportunity to connect with kids in remote communities in Alaska."

"For Project BrownDown, we're looking specifically at what happens in the fall," Mulder said. "We found in previous research that non-native plants kept producing leaves 26 days longer than native plants. We want to know is this common across Alaska?"

Training for Project BrownDown will start Aug. 9 in Fairbanks.

Anyone interested in participating is encouraged to sign up on the project's websites.

"You don't need to have any experience with plants or computers," said Katie Villano Spellman, citizenscience project coordinator. "All you'll need is enthusiasm and a desire to learn."

Fishing for trucks

By Sandra L. Medearis

Matt Mitchell had just got his truck up and running a couple of days ago when he parked it by the new Snake River Bridge on Saturday around supper time and hopped

Then he had to start it again with the screwdriver -to-solenoid technique well known in rural Alaska where new vehicles have to come in by barge at great price.

"Somehow it was in gear and it started driving into the river," Mitchell said Monday evening.

Mitchell jumped back into his truck Saturday night to stop its unauthorized roll toward the river.

Down over the rocks they went, truck and driver. Mitchell couldn't save the truck. He had to save himself. He hopped out just as the green Ford pickup was about to enter the water. He barked up his shins and hands on the rocks.

How did it go down over the boulders bumpety-bump and into the river landing right side up?

No problem. "It just drove right in there," Mitchell exclaimed Monday night as he and some true friends worked to on the axle under water. They fastened the line Keith Fimon's front-end loader, poised close to the rocks to take part in the classic Nome entertainment.

The successful extraction from the Snake ended dimmed the spotlight on the truck that shone brighter than the Midnight Sun for 48 hours.

On Sunday, the truck, submerged more or less according to the tide coming into the Snake River mouth, was drawing onlookers and sidewalk superintendents. Already a tide marker, the truck was becoming a new Nome landmark, especially as it was near a popular fishing hole.

"There are lots of pinks right there," a father told his young son. "Go ahead, cast your line right in front of the truck.

The fishing was good and the pinks were piling up on the bank at the Seppala Drive end of the bridge. Fishers cast lines in front, in back of the truck, and on both sides, but with the characteristic elusiveness of a red (Coho) salmon, the truck wasn't

Both the state Dept. of Fish and Game and the Alaska State Troopers told Mitchell to get the truck out of the river-now-Fimon said. All throughout the operation folks kept fishing, seeming to look more for free food than entertainment.

"We checked the whole operation with those agencies before we started pulling it out," Fimon said. 'They told us to go ahead.'

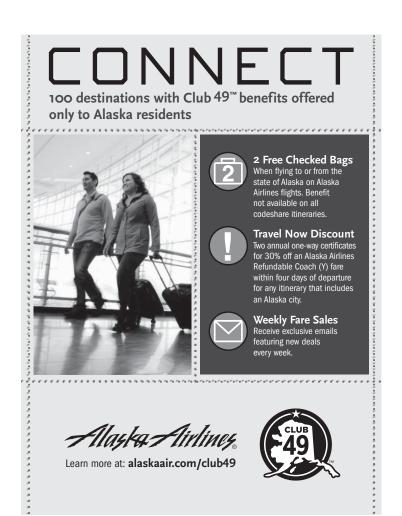

He will dry the truck out and start to sell parts, Mitchell said. Too bad that his smartphone and iPad were on the seat when it went in.

"The phone has insurance, but the iPad was a gift," he said.

Fimon's face was almost too small for the big grin he was wearing when he looked down from his loader after he had the dripping green pickup back onto land Monday evening.

"Living in Nome, I am 100 percent qualified by experience to do this kind of job," he laughed. "And besides, I have a billion dollars of in-

Planning panel tackles parking regulations

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission spent at least two hours before and after its regular meeting July 2, sifting through a proposed set of parking regulations June 2 that had already had a going-over by Nome's city attorney firm.

The panel has plans for more work—probably a lot more—to let Nome motorists know where they can put their cars while shopping and tending to business. When the document is ready for Nome Common Council approval, the Commission hopes downtown parking congestion will lessen with best use of space, some affected by new time limits. A parking ordinance would also provide a planning tool for new development in terms of number of parking spaces required to serve buildings and businesses.

Under action items, the group elected after discussion to take no action on a request from resident Kat Lee that the City add two stop signs to slow traffic from east to west at the intersection of Fourth Avenue and East H Street. The NPC had asked the opinions of the public works road crew and NPD Chief John Papasodora on the issue.

Nathan Barron of the Nome Public Works Dept. replied that the crew saw no justification for a four-way stop on the "major thoroughfare." The intersection has good visibility, Barron said with a 60-ft. right-ofway on both roads.

Enforce the existing signs the road crew suggested.

"We think most of the stop sign issues would be more of an enforcement to get people to stop at the stop signs," Barron said.

Papasodora liked the idea of adding stop signs, he said in an email to Jill Nederhood, assistant city clerk.

"Sounds like a good idea to me. I will be looking at the stop signs in the city and see where additional traffic control or signage may be helpful." Papasodora said.

Kat Lee was disappointed when she got the letter from Eileen Bechtol, city planner, explaining why the City did not take action on her request

"I just worry about all the little kids running around in the area of the intersection," Lee said. "There is a park on H Street between Third Avenue and Fourth Avenue that draws lots of small children. That is one reason there are small children at that intersection.

"I am surprised no child has been hurt. In the spring when there was an accident at the intersection, the glass came onto my yard and porch, and I am on H Street, second house from the intersection," Lee said.

City Manager Josie Bahnke passed along a report from Candace Weidler, executive assistant, concerning a successful spring cleanup campaign. Nomeites threw away nearly 100 dump truck loads of unwanted items, Weidler said in her report. The public works crew collected 18 refrigerators along with 8 vehicles and carried 73 dump truck loads to the monofill. The state Dept. of Transportation crew additionally took about 20 dump truck loads to the monofill.

People who collected a minimum of 15 bags made themselves eligible for a drawing of seven bicycles donated by the Nome Aviation and Military Museum. The bicycles went to Brayden Bahnke, Nome Rotary Club (2), Ella Hubert, Daniel Head, Ryder McGuffey and Ethan Kelso.

Each trash collector received prizes from City of Nome. Trash collectors ate hot dogs provided by Alaska Commercial Co. and washed them down with sodas from Nome Joint Utility System. The Polar Café gave children a coupon for a free ice cream cone. Food distribution came out of the Bering Sea Lions Club food bus.

A number of organizations earned $100 each for helping to staff the collection sites: Girl Scout Troup # 303; Nome Community Center Youth Court; Nome Winter Sports Association; Nome Alumni Association and Anvil City Science Academy ACTION Team.

Sponsors also included GCI, KICY, KNOM and the Nome Nugget newspaper.

large $1.3 million grant also will work with the City and Kawerak to provide assistance to get more grants for the project. Kaplan hopes that the Rasmuson's grant will encourage other organizations, and Nome businesses or citizens to support the project.

The board also awarded a grant of $173,524 to Norton Sound Health Corporation to renovate health clinics in Shishmaref and Wales.

Touring

Kaplan, Cathy Rasmuson and three staff members as well as Nina Kemppel, president and CEO of the Alaska Humanities Forum, visited Nome and several southern Seward Peninsula communities to see projects that have been funded with Rasmuson grants and also to hear what the communities' priorities are for future grants.

The Rasmuson Foundation was founded in 1955 as a private family foundation. During the staff's tour of the region, Kaplan explained to community members that the foundation's interest is to mostly fund arts, culture, health and social services. Cathy Rasmuson further specified that the foundation stays away from funding roads, schools, operational costs or other areas typically funded by governmental entities. stressed that Rasmuson is very interested in funding books, audio books and videos for libraries. She said that the foundation is nearing its 60th birthday and that its purpose is to "do good things in Alaska."

To that end, the foundation has two funding pots for capital projects: Tier 1 awards fund projects smaller than $25,000. Kaplan listed examples such as library books, playground equipment, skate parks, Senior programs and transportation vans. Tier 2 fund capital projects, often as a match with other entities, that require more than $25,000.

Rasmuson Foundation board members travel to a different region each year, to learn firsthand about prevalent needs that the Rasmuson Foundation can help to fulfill. Last year, the 11-member board traveled to the region and visited communities north of Nome. This year, the board went to the Yukon River communities of Galena and Tanana.

Cathy Rasmuson, Kaplan and their staff returned to Nome last week to visit the southern part of the Norton Sound region because they have not been there before and wanted to learn about the region's needs. "You tell us what your priorities are," said Cathy Rasmuson in Koyuk. "We want it to be from the bottom up, so you decide what you want us to fund."

During a meeting with the Native Village of Koyuk, tribal leaders and the City of Koyuk, the visitors learned about the need for an ambulance that runs and that would fit more people than just the patient and an EMT. Also, plans to develop a multi-purpose building are 95 percent finished. Grant writer Laverne Kimoktoak said costs are pegged at about $1.6 million. Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. has already pledged $350,000 toward the project. Kimoktoak said more funds are needed to begin the construction phase. She was encouraged to pursue a combination of federal and Rasmuson Foundation sources.

Are there funds to combat dust on roads? "No, we don't do roads, utilities or public schools," answered Kaplan.

One of the most pressing priorities for Koyuk is culture and language preservation. "Ninety-nine percent of our language is gone already," said Georgeanne Anaogak.

She made the case for teaching Inupiaq values to squash prevalent vandalism by unsupervised and bored youth. Maggie Otton, the school's librarian, asked about the chances to get funding to expand the Alaska section of the library? Excellent chances, was the answer. "We love funding libraries and books," said Kaplan. "I cannot remember us turning down an application for that."

Other than dishing out money, Kaplan explained, the Rasmuson Foundation can also help with their predevelopment program.

In case of Koyuk's need to complete a facility to house the Headstart class, which is currently housed in the Armory building, the foundation can help by sending experts to assess what is needed to complete a project. Even so this is not a direct funding award, the services rendered are on average worth $60,000 and Rasmuson helps to connect the applicant with experts at the Foraker Group and a network of other organizations.

Nina Kemppel with the Alaska Humanities Forum explained her interest funding projects that record knowledge of elders to be incorporated in youth education.

In Golovin, the group attended a celebration for a new Search and Rescue building that was built in part with Rasmuson Foundation funds. Since weather did not cooperate, a trip to White Mountain was canceled and they flew to St. Michael, where the Rasmuson Foundation helped to get a Code Blue emergency vehicle.

In Elim, IRA President Robert Keith welcomed the group to the tribal offices. Tyler Ivanoff presented Elim's priority list, topped by the need for a new water source further away from village. As a development project, one of Elim's priorities is to develop a granite rock quarry. Robert Keith pointed out that regional erosion problems create a vast demand for armor rock to fend off coastal and river erosion.

In the basement of the City offices, the group was introduced to the City's vision of creating a Youth and Elder Center, where Elders and crafters share their knowledge and skills with young people. Emily Murray presented the concept, saying that Elim has many gifted and talented artists making fish hooks, carvings, basket makers, seamstresses and bead artists. "We envision to create a safe place for kids to have a craft shop and develop their skills," Murray said. "We want to get away from the entitlement mentality and develop self esteem in our youth." The plan was to use the old high school building to house the proposed Elder and Youth Cultural Center.

Kaplan suggested taking advantage of the Rasmuson Foundation's predevelopment program to figure out if the old building is worth fixing up and the associated costs.

To every community visited, Cathy Rasmuson presented a $1,000 check for a project of their choice.

CRAB:

To date 38 permit holders have registered for the open access fishery. Last year 36 permit holders registered and 33 permit holders made at least one delivery during the season. Two permit holders have registered for CDQ fishery. The catch through Sunday morning was 43,000 pounds by 20 permit holders.

SALMON: Norton Sound

King Salmon escapement counts have shown a great improvement over recent years throughout Norton Sound. The department appreciates the sacrifice fishermen have made this season and their continued support and conservation efforts. The sustainability of the king salmon run depends on our combined efforts.

Chums and pinks were setting off the fireworks in the water over the Fourth of July weekend. All six subdistricts in Norton Sound District had commercial salmon fishing peri-

The chums have shown great early run strength and the pinks are starting to skyrocket in catches in southern Norton Sound. Pink counts were starting to shoot up at numerous counting towers and weirs over the weekend. Get ready! The pinks are coming! The pinks are coming!

The department is coordinating with the buyer in setting up commercial salmon fishing periods. The buyer has become swamped with fish and in Subdistricts 2-4, Golovin, Elim and Norton Bay, had to reduce the time they were able to buy fish in the most recent 48-hour fishing period that will end Sunday evening.

Fishermen are reminded to stay in close contact with the buyer to make sure there is a market for their fish. The buyer is having capacity issues and may need to suspend buying during some fishing periods.

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon catches through the morning of July 6 were: 215 kings, 32,500 chums, 88,000 pinks, 62 reds and 1 silver by 62 permit holders. Last year 124 permit holders fished at least once during the season so only half are at the party now.

At this time the department is managing the Golovin Subdistrict chum salmon fishery based on the Kwiniuk River tower escapement counts. Comparing Niukluk River tower chum salmon counts (1995-2012) with Kwiniuk River tower chum salmon counts of the same year there has been agreement between both rivers achieving or not achieving their respective escapement goals in 16 of 18 years. The department will also evaluate catch per unit of effort (CPUE) in the commercial fishery for additional fishing time. Cumulative counts through July 5 were 3 king, 198 chums, 36 pinks, and 329 reds. In 3 of the previous 5 years the cumulative red count was 0 by this date and in the other 2 years was in the single digits. PARADE - Lady Liberty Kathryn Fitzhugh leads the Fourth of July parade in Nome before the street games took over Front Street.

Independence Day draws crowds to Front Street parade and games

Nome celebrated the 238th birthday of America on a chilly day with a full day of races, a parade and hours of fun-filled street games. Despite thick morning fog that shrouded Anvil Mountain in a wall of grey, temperatures that didn't go above 49F all day and an early race start at 8 a.m., a record amount of 42 runners signed up to participate in the race from Front Street to the top of Anvil Mountain and back (see story page 20). Just as the last runners finished, the obligatory 4th of July Parade began to move from the east end of Front Street to Bering Street. The parade was led by Nome Police and the Nome Boy Scouts. A colorful array of participants included PAWS of Nome and Nome's own two Icelandic ponies "Nina" friends, several church congregations of Nome, the Boys and Girls Club. the Nome Fire Volunteer Fire and Ambulance Departments, the GPAA motorcade and the Nome St. Lawrence Island dancers.

Before City Clerk Tom Moran declared the street games to begin, the Boy Scouts presented the colors, Jill Nederhood sang the National Anthem and Mayor Denise Michels held a speech on the privilege of living in a free society that embraces diversity and the hard-won freedom resulting in the Declaration of Independence by the nation's founding fathers. In honor of those who defend the American freedom, the St. Lawrence Island Dancers performed a dance called "Army".

And then the games began. Participants of all ages duked it out in various foot races, bike races, slow races, races without shoes, races with eggs, three-legged races and races on stilts, in gunny sacks and in wheelbarrows. After the pie-eating contest, war came to an abrupt end when the rope broke. Several people were seen hobbling off the scene, but no serious injuries were reported. After that, nimble jumpers tried their luck at the Alaskan High Kick and even a blanket toss was held at Anvil City Square.

The day came to an end with the free ice-cream served by the Nome Volunteer Fire Department.

Rural residents demand seat at table as Alaska formulates Arctic policy

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission held a public listening session gathering input on what should flow into the State's Arctic policy the commission is tasked to formulate. The session took place on Wednesday, July 2 unbeknownst to most rural residents who are not privy to legislative update emails or who are not keeping a keen eye on AAPC meetings.

One of the AAPC's stated goals is to influence federal Arctic policy. With a White House Arctic policy already formulated, and federal agencies, including the Pentagon drafting their own Arctic policies, the Commission needs to catch up with the fast pace. As part of the information gathering process, the AAPC conducted meetings in Nome, Barrow, Juneau, Unalaska, Fairbanks and Anchorage in the last two years.

During last week's listening session, a broad spectrum of issues was addressed, not only concerns of increased Arctic marine traffic and climate change. The meeting was conducted in Anchorage, but participants could call in.

Tom "Ukallaysaaq" Okleasik, executive director of the Native Village of Kotzebue addressed a catalogue of issues that he'd like to see woven into the state's Arctic policy. He spoke for the need to fund Inupiaq language revitalization programs. By creating policy to support and fund language revitalization initiatives, the Inupiaq culture would be prone to stay alive and could continue to contribute to the fabric of the Arctic. He spoke about the importance of subsistence and how subsistence hunters and gatheres help and inform research and science. In terms of policy, Okleasik suggested to have a principal or co-principal investigator of science projects actually present to do science in the rural communities and the Arctic.

Okleasik said that the current model of colonization is still used when it comes to resource development in the Arctic. "Resource develhas followed the colonization model," Okleasik said. "We need to question that model."

He suggested a policy modeled after British Columbia, where governments share their mining tax with the first nation people that are directly affected by a mine or other resource development.

Okleasik called for a 'decolonization' of the Arctic by instituting such revenue sharing mechanism.

Okleasik also asked for broader community representation at the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission. He observed that the vast majority of commissioners don't have a stake in the Arctic as they don't live there.

Art Ivanoff with the Bering Sea Alliance LLC, addressed the need for inclusion of people living along northwest Alaskan coastlines. "It's important for villages to have a place at the table as agencies are making decisions for them. There is a need for inclusion," Ivanoff said.

National/Homeland Security and Coast Guard focus group team leader and Commissioner Rep. Alan Austerman reported that substantial money will follow once the defense and military departments decide on priorities in the Arctic. "Defense and security are like big ships on the horizon," he said. "There will be a monster heading our way and we can't forget that we need to state our concerns and preferences.

Jack Omelak testified for the Marine Mammal coalition and addressed the need to protect subsistence resources to ensure some level of food security. He suggested to view subsistence as its own form of economy. "It's unfortunate that everything is weighed against economic development," he said. Giving the example of Bering Straits Native Corporation having conducted a feasibility study to develop Port Clarence, he added that development of oil spill response capabilities are crucial to secure the economic ability to survive for people living in the region. "We talk about the continuation for our people in their economic pursuit of hunting and subsistence," Omelak said. A spill would mean a massive economic disaster for people not being able to harvest what is the economic backbone of their subsistence econ-

Jim Stotts, ICC-Alaska, weighed in and cautioned the Commissioners to take into account that good things take time. "When it comes to Arctic port decisions, we should all figure out where the best places are, rather than having eight different circumpolar countries pursue their agendas," Stotts said. "There is a rush going on. Everbody thinks that we are behind, but I am afraid that we are making half-assed decisions.'

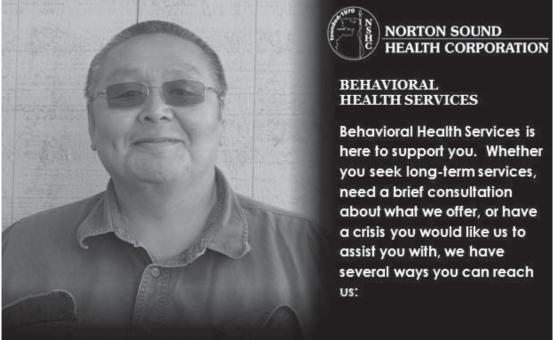

He also seconded Tom Okleasik's notion of continued colonization and recognized that local people have no skin in the game in terms of inclusion of policy making. He asked for a mechanism and process to include Arctic residents.

Stotts also brought up social issues, the broader question of healthy communities and adaptations to climate change. "You need to get something in the policy that addresses sustainable communities," he said. "And then you have to include our culture. If you want us to respect your culture, respect ours."

The Commission is made up of 26 Commissioners, including ten Legislators and 16 experts from throughout the state. The commission has created focused policy teams addressing categories such as Oil & Gas development/mining; science, traditional knowledge, research and climate change; Governance and indigenous issues; planning and infrastructure development; National Security and Coast Guard; and Ma-Transportation Fish&Wildlife.

The Commission is slated to produce a final report for the state's legislature early next year. The next meeting of the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission will take place on August 26 in Nome, at the Aurora Inn between 9 am and 4 pm. On August 27 they will meet in Kotzebue. At the Nome and Kotzebue meetings, public testimony will be reviewed and revisions will begin for the final re-

On November 13 and 14, a meeting is scheduled for Anchorage to review final recommendations and finalize the report.

Reducing your risk for kidney stones

By Bob Lawrence, MD

Alaska Family Doctor

Stone formation in the kidney, called nephrolithiasis, can lead to one of the most painful conditions known to humans: passing a stone.

If you are one of the many people at risk for kidney stones, preventing these stones should be a priority. As with most conditions in the medical world, prevention of kidney stones is preferred to the treatment.

People with a personal history of kidney stones or people with a family history of the condition should also take special steps to prevent the development of stones.

There are basically five different types of kidney stones. Each type is made up of minerals excreted in excess by the kidneys. When these minerals become concentrated in the urine, small crystals begin to form that grow into small stones as the crystals pass through the kidney, similar to the way wet snow forms an increasingly larger snowball as it is rolled across more snow.

The most common stones are made of calcium and oxalate. Other stones are made of uric acid crystals, phosphate, or rarely, cystine.

Doctors can analyze kidney stones passed by patients to determine the stone's composition. Identifying the type of kidney stone may be helpful to people who have had more than one attack.

Regardless of the type of stone, certain steps can be taken by anyone to decrease the risk of stone forma-

- Drink plenty of water. This is the single most important way to prevent all types of stone formation. Experts recommend drinking enough fluid to produce 2 liters of clear urine each day.
- Eat citrus fruits like oranges, lemons, or limes. These fruits contain a compound called citrate that prevents stone formation. Grapefruit can cause stone formation and is therefore considered an exception to this rule.

- Avoid dark sodas (pop). Dark sodas increase the risk of calcium oxalate stones.
- Drink coffee and tea in moderation. This will increase overall fluid intake and may help lower the risk of
- Maintain a healthy weight. People with a BMI above 30 are much more likely to form stones.
- Reduce meats, but increase vegetable protein in the diet. Animal protein, including red meat, fish, and eggs, contains purines, which increase the risk of forming uric acid
- Take calcium supplements with food. Calcium in the diet binds to oxalate in the intestines. This effectively traps oxalate, the most common cause of kidney stones, before it enters the blood stream.
- For the same reason, eat high calcium foods, like dairy, with foods high in oxalate like spinach, rhubarb,
  - Finally, reduce overall salt intake. A high salt diet leads to unbound calcium in the urine, which increases the risk of stones.

Anyone who develops a kidney stone should seek a medical evaluation to identify the size, location, and most likely cause of the stone formation. Many stones can be passed with the help of medication, though some require surgical intervention depending on the size and location.

Prevention of stones is much preferred, not to mention less painful, and requires very little effort or expense. Consider speaking with your doctor or dietician about specific changes you can make to your diet to prevent the development of kidney # lawsuit against Pebble Partnership

DILLINGHAM, AK – In order to help protect the strength of the Clean Water Act, the United Tribes of Bristol Bay announced that it will intervene in the Pebble Limited Partnership's lawsuit against the Environmental Protection Agency. The UTBB's founding tribes originally requested EPA's measures to proactively protect Bristol Bay from the potential impacts of large-scale metallic sulfide mining like the proposed Pebble Mine through an open, scientific process and the organization remains in strong support of agency action.

The Pebble Limited Partnership has proposed to build one of the world's largest open-pit gold and copper mines at the headwaters of the two major rivers feeding into Bristol Bay. According to a threeyear peer-reviewed study, a largescale mine like Pebble would have devastating effects on Bristol Bay salmon and thus the indigenous people of Bristol Bay who depend on

The Parnell Administration officially joined the Pebble Partnership in its legal challenge against the EPA last month. This news comes as salmon return strong to Bristol Bay's healthy river systems. "The 404(c) process over which the Pebble Partnership and the Parnell Administration is suing is the very course that the United Tribes of Bristol Bay, along with thousands of Alaskans, requested the EPA take in efforts to protect our people and region from the harmful effects of large-scale mining," said United Tribes of Bristol Bay President Robert Heyano. "By initiating a lawsuit, the Partnership shows continued disregard for the scientific facts that prove this type of mining in Bristol Bay will be devastating to our region, a continued disinterest in the open and transparent public process we requested, and dismissal of the overwhelming desire of the Bristol Bay communi-

In addition to filing the federal suit, the Partnership also recently requested that the judge order the EPA to halt its 404(c) review of effects of the proposed Pebble Mine on the Bristol Bay watershed. "We can't continue to be held hostage by Pebble's undefined and arbitrary time-line," said Heyano. "We need

By intervening in this lawsuit, the Tribes will arduously defend the EPA as it has been the only entity that has listened to the needs and desires of the people of Bristol Bay when the state and Pebble Partnership repeatedly failed

On June 21, at the Alaska Academy of Family Physicians Annual Scientific Conference in Seward, President Marin Academy Granholm, M.D., Dr. Sai-Ling Liu and Dr. Shana Theobald, presented David M. Head M.D. of Nome, the 2014 Alaska Family Physician of the Year award. Dr. Head was nominated by Michelle Hensel MD and was the unanimous winner of this statewide honor by the AKAFP Board of Directors.

Dr. David Head

Dr. David Head has served at Norton Sound Health Corporation (NSHC) since July 1988, and has served as chief of staff and medical director since December 1989. Dr. Head has provided village services in all 16 villages surrounding Nome and is highly regarded as a committed and excellent physician. Dr. Head has been able to lead the medical care of the NSHC region for the past 26 years in this role with excellence and stability. Dr. Head has shown his dedication by taking care of patients on countless medivacs, and seeing his patients in primary care, villages, the emergency department, and in-patient. As a board certified family physician, Dr. Head leads by example in the practice of rural medicine and as chief of staff and has held many local, state and national positions. Advisor to the Governor, Council on Trauma, Alaska

The presence of Dr. Head and his family in rural Alaska for the past 26 years is a strong testament to the value and dedication of this family medicine physician. In 1998, Dr. Head received the NSHC Superior Achievement Award in his role "that negotiated and planned for the tribal assumption of the Alaska Native Medical Center. Dr. Head brought a calm demeanor, excellent analytical skills, and the ability to find compromises that were acceptable to both sides of the many disagreements that occurred during this process. His unquestioned fairness, honesty, and leadership were recognized and respected by all of the participants in this process." In 2000, Dr. Head received the IHS Physician Leader of the Year award. He was relentless in negotiating funding and design for NSHC's new hospital Dr. David Head is a true leader and representative of NSHC.

The Family Physician of the Year Award is the highest honor given to a member of the Alaska Academy of Family Physicians. The winner is truly the best of the best. The criteria for this award are (1) to be a compassionate, caring family physician, (2) have engaged in community involvement that enhances the quality of life in his/her home area, and (3) provides a credible role model as a healer and human being to his/her community, and as a professional in the science and art of medicine to colleagues, other health professionals, and especially to young physicians in training and medical students.

The Alaska Academy of Family Physicians is a state chapter of the American Academy of Family Physicians, which was founded in 1947; the AAFP represents more than 100,000 physicians and medical students nation-wide. It is the only medical society devoted solely to primary care. Family medicine's cornerstone is an ongoing, personal patient-physician relationship focused on integrated care.

least 10 dogs in the past two years, in the city limits of Nome. The details of those incidents are listed below along with a radio interview that aired on KNOM Friday June 13, 2014.

All but one the dogs listed were tied up either right by a house or in a lot with other dogs, in one case a dog was tied up and not near any vegetation food source or willow cover and was still sought out by a musk-oxen and was attacked.

The dogs are not in any way harassing the musk oxen because the musk oxen are the ones invading the dogs' territory/property. These dogs are secured and have no defense against the musk oxen's horns or hooves unless a human is quick enough to intervene. Chain link animal pens are not an effective deterrent because in at least two cases the musk oxen have been observed ramming the pens and have been successful in knocking them over.

One analysis is that the musk oxen realize that the bears are not willing to adjust to people the way they (the musk oxen) have, so the city of Nome is now a safe bear free haven for musk oxen with young calves to rear and graze. Recently though, bears have increasingly been observed just on the fringes of Nome's populated areas.

This situation of a 600+ pound horned wild animal living in close proximity to Nome's residential areas is not safe for people, dogs or the musk oxen themselves. People are in danger of being charged, the dogs are in mortal danger and some dogs cannot be watched 24 hours a day to be protected and also may not be able to be kept inside. The musk oxen are trying to adjust their natural habitat to a place with cars, busses, bikes and taxis dodging them in the fog and on curvy roads. People are increasingly putting themselves knowingly or unknowingly in harm's way. Dogs have already paid the price, even though they were restrained according to Nome's leash

In addition while this bear and musk oxen predator/prey dance is occurring, the bears are getting bolder and are now making more frequent forays into the city of Nome.

The Nome Kennel Club is not only concerned about the canine companions in the city of Nome, we are also extremely worried about

People likely cannot out run a charging musk oxen (especially children) and no one is fast enough to outrun a bear.

As previously stated, we realize that living in Alaska, whether it be in a rural community or a city, comes with its share of wildlife encounters but this has escalated fast to an unsafe level. Citizens should not have to be afraid of going for a run, walking their dogs or simply letting their children play outside or tie their dog up in their yard. We would like to see a solution to this problem soon before a person is injured; the loss of life can be expected to continue with the current situation.

Sincerely,

The Nome Kennel Club Board: Chrystie Salesky, Kirsten Bey, Janet Balice, Deb Trowbridge and Tom Jamgochian.

Dear Editor:

My name is Lisa Ellanna, representing the Community Alcohol Safety Team.

First of all, thank you to our City Council members and our mayor for initiating an important conversation when it comes to taxing those substances that help to create such an economic burden on our town, and a special thanks to the Nugget for sharing this letter.

The Nome Community Alcohol Safety Team would like to share some research findings that may be helpful to consider in deciding whether or not to tax alcohol and tobacco in our community.

Within Alaska, a study done by Alexander C. Wagenaar shares that: "Results show statistically significant reductions in the numbers of deaths caused by alcohol related disease beginning immediately after the 1983 and 2002 alcohol tax increases in Alaska."

The study found that "increases in alcoholic beverage tax rates were associated with significant and substantial reductions of alcohol-related disease mortality in Alaska."

A recent study done by the Center for Disease Control made two important findings: 1) "Young adults are more responsive to price increases than adults" and 2) "Consuming alcohol leads to an increase in high risk sexual behavior." Please be advised that Nome has the highest rates of STIs such as Chlamydia in the State of Alaska.

alcohol use rates in Nome, it is important to mention that a 2012 University of Michigan Monitoring the Future survey concluded: "Results indicate that alcohol is now represented as the 'gateway' drug, leading to the use of tobacco, marijuana, and other illicit substances. Moreover, students who used alcohol exhibited a significantly greater likelihood of using both licit and illicit drugs." That said, the study further concluded, "the use of other substances could be impacted by delaying or preventing alcohol use, therefore, it seems prudent to focus prevention efforts, policies, and monies, on addressing adolescent al-cohol use." Taxes would be optimal in curbing youth alcohol use and this study suggests, secondarily, tobacco and drug use as well.

Nome Police Chief John Papasodora is a member of the Nome Community Alcohol Safety Team, and has been very active in working toward more focused prevention efforts. Recently, Chief Papasodora made it possible to capture alcohol relatedness data for every call that comes in to the Police Department. As you have heard from the Chief's reports over the past several years, a great majority of calls received by

Within Nome, Norton Sound Health Corporation statistics share that alcohol related visits to the emergency room between the years of 1999 and 2009, nearly doubled from 2339 to 3935. In 2008, there were 332 ambulance calls, of which 191 of them were alcohol related. More recently, in 2012, alcohol related ambulance runs totaled 143, and 166 in 2013.

The communities of Dillingham, Bethel, Juneau, Sitka, Fairbanks, Fairbanks North Star Borough, North Pole, Craig, Saint Mary's, Anchorage, Mat-Su Borough, Barrow, and Anaktuvuk Pass all maintain either an alcohol tax, tobacco tax or both taxes concurrently. Municipal alcohol and tobacco taxes have been financially helpful for their budgets. For example, as a council action, not a ballot measure, the Bethel City Council passed their tobacco excise tax in 2012, and in 15 months has raised $600,000. The Bethel tax was on tobacco alone Consider what the positive financial impact would be for Nome considering we would be taxing alcohol in addition to tobacco.

It is the Nome Community Alcohol Safety Team's strong opinion that the City of Nome move forward with increased taxation of alcohol and tobacco.

Collins first to emerge from the fog at 36th annual Anvil Mountain Run

By Keith Conger

Last Friday's thick blanket of fog was just typical summertime coastal Bering Sea weather, or maybe the spirit of former Anvil Mountain Run champion Mark Rogers was responding to the whisperings of another serious attempt on his 26-year-old course record.

Leo Rasmussen, who established the event in 1979, and has overseen Alaska's second oldest running race for 36 years, has heard talk of record breaking before.

Prior to the race, Rasmussen stated that in 1988 Rogers completed the annual 4th of July course up and down Nome's signature mountain in 1 hour, 11 minutes, and 23 seconds, breaking his own mark for the second time, thus establishing "a record that will probably stand the test of time.'

It is a performance that no one has really gotten close to breaking, said Rasmussen. In fact, only five runners have ever completed the 12.5 mile, 1,116 foot elevation race in under 1 hour, 15 minutes.

Enter local runner, and high school cross-country coach, Jeff Collins, who brought a lengthy longdistance running resume - including qualifying for the United States Marathon National Championships in 2000 - to his first attempt at the race on the mountain.

Collins was the first to emerge from the arctic haze, posting a time of 1 hour, 21 minutes, 50 seconds. Although he fell short of setting a new record, the 42 Anvil Mountain

"Rogers record is super impressive," said Collins after the race, "but last year somebody broke the Mount Marathon record that stood for 32 years. Rogers set the precedent (for this race), and its time to step up the challenge he set so many years ago.

For the duration of the race, the entire mountain was shrouded in fog that was only allowing for about 30 yards of visibility. So, when Collins got a few steps off his intended course on the steepest uphill section, it may have been a sign that the record was destined to live another

Collins would later thank one of his protegés, 15-year-old Wilson Hoogendorn, for getting him back on track, and would later return the favor by yelling out in the fog on the steep descent aiding Hoogendorn as he blindly negotiated his way down the mist-soaked, slippery and rocky Hoogendorn, who ran the race in 1 hour, 23 minutes, 30 seconds, was able to keep his coach, and training partner, within visual distance until Anvil Rock at the mountain's summit, and would be the first runner under 18 to complete the race. Hoogendorn was able to hold off Nome's Nils Hahn, a veteran of five Anvil Mountain runs, by two minutes for second place.

Hahn will have to run the race another 25 years to the catch Nome's David Olson, who, doing his best Cal Ripkin Jr. Ironman impression, completed his 30th Anvil Mountain Run, consecutively no less. Olson broke the two hour mark by 21 seconds.

Olson was impressed that there were so many people joining the race this year. "One year only seven people ran the race. I thought that if I kept coming, some year nobody would show up, and I would win," joked Olson after the race.

The Anvil Mountain Run regular has often been joined in the race by his family members. This year daughter Annie Kate, who first followed her dad in the race as a 12year-old, had only two women cross the line before her.

The younger Olson was outdistanced by Californian Elaina Cromer, who was fresh off a 2014 victory in the five kilometer (3.1 mile) Gold Dust Dash, and veteran Nome distance runner Crystal Tobuk, who completed the Boston Marathon in April.

Cromer, a trained short distance athlete in college, who was running her first long event, said she was unsure how to run a race of this length. "I kept telling myself not to stop on the hill," she said. Cromer's completed the course in a time of 1 hour, 31 minutes, 58 seconds.

That strategy proved successful as Cromer was able to make up the sizable advantage Tobuk had established before the 759 foot, 1.6 miles long climb that the Anvil Mountain Road offered. By the top of the mountain, Cromer had a lead that she would not give up.

University of Alaska Fairbanks professor Greg Finstad won the award for first runner over 55, finishing in fifth place overall with a time of 1 hour, 25 minutes, 18 seconds, one spot behind under-20 runner Nick Morgan of Nome.

Morgan reiterated the post-race buzz about the weather-induced navigational challenges, stating that from the top "you can barely tell (where the worn trail down is) even when its clear out."

Rasmussen said that some years the runners have been greeted with rain, sleet, or even fresh snow at the top, further making Rogers record hard to top.

Olson thought the 42°F, no-wind weather at race time provided the perfect conditions, and was "much better that being hot.'

The mention of foggy weather took second place at the pre-race meeting to the warning of bears, which have been seen in great frequency this year on the mountain. "Don't play with 'em," warned Rasmussen.

The two five-foot inflatable "scare bears" placed just north of the city by the local game officials did not discourage a herd of 40 plus musk oxen from spectating within 20 yards of the road during the first half-mile of the race. The runners were actually better protected by Anvil Rock check point person John Handeland, a 35year Anvil Mountain Run volunteer, who toted a side arm at the summit.

Despite the challenging weather conditions on the mountain portion of the race, which caused nearly every runner to lose the trail at some point, all participants were able to complete the course before the Fourth of July festivities.

"I usually come in when the parade is going on," said smiling Anvil Mountain Run veteran Dora Hughes after the race, "so this is a PR (personal record) for me."

INTO THE FOG - AnnieKate Olson of Nome heads into the fog after having made it to the top of Anvil Mountain, elevation 1,116 feet. Olson finished the race as the third fastest woman, ahead of her father and 30-time Anvil Mountain run finisher David Olson.

Council approves Richard Foster Building construction, puts booze and tobacco tax on ballot

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council took up some issues Monday they had found controversial in the past and got through them maintaining kind spirits and light hearts.

The Council caused spectators to clap their hands when it passed a resolution giving contractor ASRC SKW Eskimo a notice to proceed with the construction phase of the Richard Foster Building.

The project will showcase the Carrie M. McLain Museum, the library and Kawerak's Beringia Culture and Science Center.

Cost of the work had been penciled in at $12.2 million and awarded to SKW, but the Council had held off on giving the starting flag while project managers looked for savings through value engineering and sought more funds.

The project manager, architects and general contractor cooperated in value engineering exercises that reduced the construction cost by approximately $700,000, bringing the figure down to $10.5 million and reducing the overall cost to just under $19 million.

The current plan allows for all three entities, the library, Carrie M.

McLain Museum and Beringia to open and operate within available funds

The Council gave the Richard Foster Building the go-head with the lion's share of funding secured.

Diomede sees passenger flights restored

By Diana Haecker

The ink is dry on contracts between Erickson Helicopters Inc., Kawerak Inc. and the U.S. Dept. of Transportation to restore regularly scheduled passenger flights between Little Diomede and the mainland.

Going into its third year of scheduled passenger flights by helicopter – fixed wing airplanes can fly only during springtime when the sea ice has set up firmly enough to double as a runway – the program hit a few weeks delay.

When the fiscal year ended on June 30, paperwork had not been finalized to offer a seamless transition to the new fiscal year and a new contract

Not until July 8 did the U.S. DOT issue an order to finalize the necessary contracts.

The Department has chosen Erickson Helicopters and Kawerak Inc. to provide air transportation to Diomede, from July 1, 2014 through June 30, 2015. "The service is to consist of one round trip per week, 44 weeks per year, routed Nome to Diomede to Wales to Diomede to Nome, with four-seat B-105 helicopters," reads the document.

The story of helicopter transportation to and from Little Diomede is long and complicated, said Alaska Dept. of Transportation planner Rich Sewell. Little Diomede residents for years had only the unreliable possibility to catch a ride to or from the island by a helicopter under contract to deliver U.S. postal mail. While it was relatively easy to get a seat on a flight from Diomede to either Wales or Nome – with mail delivered, the helicopter was empty – return trips often were impossible.

Essential Air Services, a government program that subsidizes air transportation to rural communities, did not offer a way out because Little Diomede was not on a list that offered regularly scheduled air service in 1978

Being on the list would've made Diomede eligible for the program.

Musk ox pose complex problem for biologists to solve

By Sandra L. Medearis

Musk oxen entering the city limits of Nome and hanging out in parks, yards, roadsides, airport and gardens have generated many questions and one big fact.

That fact is that a solution to manage the squat, hairy guests is complicated, complex and elusive.

The question has divided opinion into more stances than just for or against the wild animals carrying the sharp horns.

This was the gist of a discussion with state Fish and Game biologist Tony Gorn.

Biologists are looking for an answer he said.

Moving them is not working, because the animals won't stay put. Biologists have considered thinning the musk ox population in the area. They may have to concentrate on the predators that make the musk ox come to town for shelter.

For now, it seems humans will have to coexist and use some common sense in sharing the community.

The human population, for its part, has shown a variety of feelings.

Some dog owners fear and hate the musk oxen because the animals have injured or killed dogs with their horns, goring them, even driving in their horns and flipping pets into the air.

Still, some dog owners have told him they like having the animals around, Gorn said.

Many welcome the animals for photo opportunities and show and tell for visiting relatives.

Concerning fish and game management, 15 years as a state biologist has show there are always polarized opinions, Gorn observed—not just with musk oxen, but also with other species.

Some people want the musk ox gone right now; others do not want state Fish and Game to do anything too aggressive. Some people think about extreme encounters between humans and bears—maulings—and think musk ox are great.

Some find the survivors from the Pleistocene period just downright annoving.

Voter registration deadline is coming up

Sunday, July 20 marks the deadline to register to vote, update voter registration or change political party affiliation for the upcoming August 19 primary election. The Division of Elections office in Nome will be open this coming weekend to assist voters. It will open on Saturday, July 19 from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and on Sunday, July 20 from 12 p.m. to 4 p.m. for voter registration.

The division also accepts voter registration applications submitted by mail, fax, or e-mail.

"I encourage Alaskans not to wait to register or make a change to your registration," said Division of Elections Director Gail Fenumiai. "Changes made after July 20, including party affiliation changes, will not be effective for the August 19 primary.'

Voter registration applications are available at any Division of Elections regional office, at municipal clerks' offices, at the Division of Motor Vehicles and at public libraries. Registration applications are also available on the Division of Elections website at www.elections.alaska.gov.

The party affiliation on a voter's record on July 20 will determine which political party ballot a voter is eligible to receive during the primary election.

More early voting sites established in region

The Alaska Federation of Natives, the ANCSA Regional Association and Get Out The Native Vote in cooperation with the Division of Elections established new absentee in-person and early voting sites throughout the state. Statewide, 128 villages were added to the list.

These voting sites were established in villages that either did not have one or needed to reestablish themselves officially with the state.

This is just one step in ensuring the Native community is able to exercise our fundamental right to vote," said Julie Kitka, President of AFN. "The team's next efforts will be to continue non-partisan voter registration, and to educate voters on the issues and candidate races."

When voting absentee in-person, the voter's eligibility to vote is verified after the voter is issued a ballot. Since the voter's eligibility cannot be verified at the time of voting, the voter's voted ballot is placed inside an absentee voting envelope prior to being placed in the ballot box. When voting early, the voter's eligibility to vote is verified at the time of voting through the Division of Elections statewide voter registration system. A voter is eligible to vote early if the voter is voting at the Regional Elections Office where the voter is registered and if the voter's registration record is active and current. Since the voter's eligibility to vote could be verified, the voter simply signs a certificate and the voted ballot is placed directly into the ballot box.

In the Norton Sound and Bering Strait region new absentee early voting sites are Brevig Mission, Buckland, Deering, Diomede, Elim, Gambell, Golovin, Koyuk, Point Hope, Point Lay, Savoonga, Shaktoolik, Shishmaref, St. Michael, Stebbins, Teller, Wales and White Moun-

Kicking the Koch Problem

The multi-billionaire Koch brothers are spending big bucks on political advertising. They are trying to call the shots on getting their wingding reactionary cronies into political office by trying to re-write history. They are bombarding television audiences with such negative and downright ugly ads that it makes viewers leap out of their chairs to leave the room and inspect their refrigerators.

Do their political strategists think the voting public is stupid? Well, yes they do. They may be banking on our gullibility and ignorance, but we can close their account. What motivates these brothers to try to buy our votes? Why do they hide behind such patriotic sounding names as Americans for Preserving our Heritage, blah, blah and commie kicking? Because they can. Because we let them. Because we are complaisant. Because we are too lazy to seek the truth.

Will we let our votes be bought or will we show them our votes are not for sale? Will we let the purveyors of ignorance call the shots? Let's let the Koch brothers and their buddies know that Alaskans can tell fact from fiction no matter how much it is wrapped in the flag in the name of phony patriotism. In reality these guys want to destroy our democracy so they can make more money. -N.L.M.-

Oil Taxes and Corruption: Why vote YES to repeal SB21?

By Dr. Tim Tilsworth

One compelling factor is the despicable politics of how SB21 came to be. Two employees of ConocoPhillips (Senator Meyer and Senator Micciche) voted to pass SB21, giving their employer huge tax breaks. That's clearly a conflict of interest, folks-a symptom of corruption. Legislators said, "Hey, we followed the rules." That's a big, big problem. Had those ConocoPhillips employees not voted, SB21 would have failed, there would be no referendum, and they wouldn't have wasted your time and money. It's dirty politics any way you cut it.

Even still, the legislature has turned a blind eye to revising its ethics rules. It's utter nonsense that our legislators can get away with this. You should be very upset! It's unacceptable that they won't police themselves, so you must do it for them!

For years arguments were that declining production was caused by ACES, there were few jobs, little drilling, and little capital investment on the North Slope. Someone even suggested repeal of SB21 would put the gas line at risk. That's fear mongering at its worst. All these arguments have fallen by the wayside. Now you're being told SB21 is causing a huge capital investment on the North Slope. What you're not told is that much of that investment was in Big Oil's plans for years. SB21 supporters point out the millions of dollars and extra jobs it will generate while blatantly ignoring the billions generated by ACES. Hmm, billions versus millions. How many extra jobs would billions create?

Recently, Goldsmith from ISER (funded by Northrim Bank) suggested that critics said SB 21 caused the $2.1 billion drop in the 2014 oil revenues. Is that the best Northrim and Goldsmith could do for $100,000? We don't contend any such thing-that drop was caused by a mature oil field and inflated industry expenses. I could have told them that for nothing.

The oil industry deducts expenses before paying taxes. The more expenses they claim, the less taxes they pay. If oil is $100/barrel and they claim $40/barrel expenses, then they only pay taxes on $60/barrel. In 2011, the industry deducted expenses of $29.57/barrel and three years later, in 2014, expenses had jumped to $49.88/barrel-a whopping 69 percent increase. Wow, that's certainly suspicious, folks!

Escalated expenses sparked the $2.1 billion state revenue shortfall-not ACES. Those expenses may be, and may not be, legitimate. But who knows? The state apparently hasn't completed timely industry audits since 2007. If the state doesn't know where it's been, how can it forecast where it's going? It's a ship without a rudder.

When oil is at $100/barrel, I'm unaware of any other place in the world where the industry deducts expenses and still makes $30/barrel profit. While SB21 may give a $5/barrel tax break for "new" oil, it does not offset the billions generated by ACES. And don't forget-the industry owns the pipeline, charges themselves a fee, and then deducts it as expenses, to transport the oil. Isn't that "double dipping?" Further, much of their capital investment and exploration have been bought and paid for by the state of Alaska.

Some want you to believe it's anti-business to vote for the repeal of SB21. Absolutely not! It's courageous to tell government and business that they're wrong. Big Oil controls 90 percent of the North Slope oil production and the industry is needed for our economy. But we don't need to "give away the farm." The oil industry and "special interest" groups are spending millions to buy the farm-and your vote. And, believe it or not, they'll deduct those millions too.

It's crystal clear who owns Alaska—the oil industry and the politicians they support, including Governor Sean Parnell, who was complicit with these actions. There are ways, which I will address following SB21's repeal, to end this veiled corruption and improve ACES.

We're smart enough, folks, to see through the slick, deceptive ad campaign funded by the oil industry and its lobbying friends

Let's take back ownership of our state. Vote YES to repeal SB21.

Dr. Tim Tilsworth is a 44-year resident of Alaska, a registered professional engineer, and is Professor Emeritus of Civil and Environmental Engineering, University of Alaska. He has authored a number of articles about ACES and SB21.

Guard Coast rescues boaters near Kotzebue

The Coast Guard, Alaska State Troopers, Kotzebue local search and rescue and the crew of the tug Naniq responded to a disabled vessel near Kotzebue, last Wednesday.

Alaska State Troopers contacted Coast Guard 17th District command center watchstanders to request aerial assistance to help locate three women and a child aboard a disabled 24-foot aluminum Harbercraft. The mariners were traveling from Buckland to Kotzebue when the weather turned bad. They attempted to return to Buckland but ran out of gas. The Naniq crew provided gas and a battery to the disabled vessel and escorted them back to Kotzebue.

A Coast Guard Air Station Kodiak MH-60 Jayhawk helicopter crew had launched and were conducting a search of the area when Alaska State Troopers reported the crew of the tug Naniq had located the missing boaters

The Jayhawk helicopter crew rendezvoused with the crew of the tug and barge Naniq who reported the vessel had lost power and run out of

The helicopter crew remained on scene while the Naniq crew assisted the disabled boaters.

'This case illustrates how invaluable good Samaritans and our local and state agencies are to the Coast Guard," said Adam De Rocher, a watchstander at Coast Guard 17th District command center. "Without our partners we wouldn't have been able to locate and provide assistance to the mariners in their time of need.'

Weather at the time of the incident was reported as 3- to 5-foot seas and 17 mph winds.

Polar bears from space

Polar bear population estimates based on satellite images are similar to aerial estimates, according to a study published July 9, 2014 in the journal PLOS ONE by Seth Stapleton from United States Geological Survey. The potentially severe impacts of climate change in the Arctic may threaten regional wildlife. Scientists trying to develop efficient and effective wildlife monitoring techniques to track Arctic populations face great challenges, including the remoteness and associated logistical constraints of accessing wildlife. In this study, scientists evaluated highresolution satellite imagery to track the distribution and abundance of polar bears on a small island in northern Canada in an attempt to develop a tool to monitor these difficult to reach populations.

Specifically, the authors examined satellite images of the island with a high density of bears, during the icefree summer and compared the images to aerial and ground surveys collected on different dates. The estimate of 90 bears based on satellite imagery was similar to an abundance estimate of 100 bears made from an aerial survey conducted a few days earlier. These findings support satellite imagery as a tool for monitoring polar bears on land, which could potentially be applied to other Arctic wildlife. The authors suggest that further automated detection developments and testing in different landscapes may provide information about benefits for large-scale application of the technology.

New board to boost tourism in Alaska

Governor Sean Parnell signed Senate Bill 194, which creates the Alaska Tourism Marketing Board within the Department of Commerce, Community, and Economic Development (DCCED). "The idea behind this board is to get the true experts of the industry together to make sure we are spending our money wisely and effectively while getting the benefit of this true expertise without any cost to the State," said Senator Lesil McGuire. "Having significant tourism marketing experience and knowledge from the private sector at the table is very beneficial.'

The SB194 requires DCCED and the newly created board to work together to plan and execute a destination tourism marketing plan for Alaska. "Without adequate and stable funding levels and a consistent marketing program, Alaska cannot effectively compete with other U.S. destinations that have increased their financial investment into their own tourism marketing programs," said Senator McGuire.

The board will be comprised of a minimum of 21 members with 18 members recommended by the Alaska Travel Industry Association, one member from DCEED, one member from the House, and one member from the Senate.

SB194 does not change how tourism marketing is currently funded or how expenditures are made by DCCED. It simply formalizes the board as being an important part of the process in the development of a marketing plan for the State. As part of this, the public members of the board serve at no cost to the State.

"Tourism continues to be a growing, renewable industry that is the second largest employer in the state. More than 1.9 million visitors came to Alaska last year spending over $1.8 billion," said Senator McGuire. "This bill is an important step in continuing the growth of one of our most important economic cornerstones."

Ship strike kills humpback

Some knew her as Max, or Aequorea, or simply #539. She had a long sighting history in Southeast Alaska, dating back to 1975, but will be seen no more. A team of nine traveled by boat to a beach near Funter Bay last Thursday to perform a necropsy on the 48-foot female humpback whale.

"The left mandible was fractured and the right mandible was traumatically dislocated from the cranium," said Dr. Kathy Burek of Alaska Veterinary Pathology Services as lead veterinarian on the necropsy. "The cause of death was determined to be ship strike.'

A charter operator reported the floating whale on Tuesday, July 1. NOAA Fisheries Protected Resources Division and Office of Law Enforcement responded to the report, and located the animal, which had likely only been dead a few days, judging from the fresh condition of the carcass. The NOAA team towed the carcass to shore in upper Chatham Strait and secured it for a necropsy

When the team of nine—a captain, a gun bearer, a veterinary pathologist, marine mammal specialists, and volunteers-arrived on the scene, they saw an exposed jawbone and the fracture was immediately apparent. The team collected various tissue and organ samples from the carcass, including stomach contents. Analysis of the eye and ear plug should tell scientists her age.

This particular humpback was first documented in Glacier Bay in 1975.

According to the collaborative Southeast Alaska humpback whale database, she's had five calves between 1982 and 2005, and has at least three grand-calves.

"She was seen regularly in Glacier Bay and Icy Strait," added Janet Neilson, also with Glacier Bay's Humpback Whale Monitoring Pro-

Gail Schubert named to Arctic Economic Council

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Alaska State Chamber of Commerce and the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission picked three Alaskan business people to represent Alaska on the newly formed Arctic Economic Council. According to a press release from the AAPC, the Council is intended to foster sustainable development, including economic growth, environmental protection and social development in the Arctic. One of the three Alaskans selected is Gail Schubert, president and CEO of the Bering Straits Native Corporation. Lori Davey, general manager, Fairweather, LLC and Bruce Harland, vice president Business Development, Crowley Marine Services, Inc. are the other two Alaskans to sit on the Council.

The Minister of the Arctic Council Leona Aglukkaq and the U.S. Department of State asked the Alaska Chamber and the AAPC to select three Alaska representatives. The AEC is an advisory council to the Arctic Council, an intergovernmental group comprised of the eight circumpolar Arctic nations Russia, Finland, Greenland, Canada, USA, Iceland, Sweden, Norway and Denmark. Six indigenous groups, including the Inuit Circumpolar Council, have permanent observer status.

In May 2015, the U.S. will assume a two-year chairmanship of the Arctic Council.

Chuck Greene, vice president Community and Regional Affairs, NANA Development Corporation was named as an alternate to the AEC.

Gail Schubert told The Nome Nugget that serving on the AEC ties in with the interest of the Bering Straits Native Corporation because of its interest in Port Clarence.

BSNC recently released the publication of a feasibility analysis for port infrastructure at Port Clarence. "It is not just development," Schubert added. "In rural Alaska we still rely on our subsistence economy. We can't stop development but we can try to ensure that policy makers listen to our concerns and protect our subsistence way of life."

Schubert said she hopes to bring to the table an approach for responsible economic development of the arctic region. "I would like to see that the needs and rights of the indigenous people are recognized and heard," she said.

The founding meeting for the Arctic Economic Council is scheduled for September, to be held in Canada.

use violation by Trinity Sails. According to a 2008 zoning ordinance, the auto repair business owned by Rolland Trowbridge at 303 West C St. is in a General Use Zone that forbids auto repair.

The Council tabled another tax issue which would have raised sales tax one percent during June, July and August, then drop it by one percent during the months of December, January and February. The measure as written, included only a raise of one percent during the summer months and seemed certain to pass, until Councilman Jerald Brown proposed an amendment to drop the tax during winter when heating expenses in Nome are as high as a cat's back.

Adopting the amendment would have required the issue to go back to first reading and public notice, according to the City administration.

Therefore, council members agreed with Councilman Tom Sparks' suggestion to table the resolution for another look.

Following public comment urging the Council to bump tobacco tax and booze tax from five percent to 10 percent rather than just eight percent, the Council held the line on taking an eight percent hike to voters in October.

Proponents of the 10 percent tax testified that no studies on youth smoking and alcohol use reported that a mere eight percent increase dimmed youths' desire to light up cigarettes or pop in a wad of tobacco "chew," Danielle Slingsby told the Council

She was not in favor of the tax increase to raise needed revenue for the City, but as a measure to increase youth health by raising cigarette tax at least $1 a pack. Raising it by just three percent to eight percent would increase the cost of cigarettes by only 35¢, not enough to make a young smoker blink, she said.

On the issue of the disputed emergency vehicles repair contract, the Council tossed the question around during a break between a work session and the start of the regular Council meeting. They came to a consensus to take it up at a work session.

Last month a bid opening on repairing the City's ER vehicles and light duty vehicles revealed that Rolland Trowbridge had cast a bid for the work lower than the other bidder, Matt Johnson, owner of Nome Machine Works. Within the five-day limit, Johnson put in a protest on the bid, questioning Trowbridge's qualification for the work and questioning whether he had space in his shop, Trinity Sails Repair in a garage leased from Wes Perkins on West C Street.

On receiving the protest, the City's administration pulled the resolution awarding the contract to Trowbridge.

Trowbridge produced his certificates and Commercial Driver's license to the satisfaction of City Manager Josie Bahnke, who put the resolution awarding the contract to Trowbridge back on the table for Council action at its July 2 meeting.

At that meeting, several members of the Council questioned Trowbridge's operation of an auto repair shop in a general use district.

Some days later, a formal zone violation protest came over the counter at City Hall. As it stands now, the building inspector, Greg Smith, is examining documents and statements to see if Trowbridge might qualify for a "grandfathered-in" use of the property for a vehicle repair shop. Rather than award the bid and wait to see what happens with the zone violation complaint, the Council elected to wait on the outcome of the investigation, then award the

Should Smith find fact against the operation at 303 West C St., Trowbridge could move, or file a protest with the Nome Planning Commission

Should Trowbridge elect to protest to the Planning Commission and end up on the wrong side of its decision, he would have an option to take his case full circle with an appeal to the Nome Common Council.

Time will tell.

Meanwhile, the City's contract with Nome Machine works expired June 24. Until a new contract is let for the following year, Bahnke may decide on a case-by-case basis whom to hire for repairs.

gram. "Our last confirmed sighting of her was in 2012."

"It is rewarding to study such long-lived beings," said Fred Sharpe, a scientist with the Alaska Whale Foundation who has also studied this humpback for many years. "By photographing their distinctively pigmented tails, we can learn much about an individual's habits and social life."

"We appreciate everyone's involvement to make this necropsy happen," said Aleria Jensen, NOAA Fisheries Alaska Region marine mammal stranding coordinator. "It is a tragic event, but important to have such a clear cause of death to understand the factors impacting hump-back whales."

Jensen added that this kind of ship strike mortality serves as a wake-up call for ocean users to be watchful while on the water.

Numerous studies have shown that slower speeds are less likely to result in injury or mortality to whales, damage to vessels, or injury to passengers.

A 2012 study examining Alaska whale-vessel collision records found 108 collisions reported in Alaska from 1978–2011, most involving small vessels.

WALRUS — A family of walruses share a ice pan in Norton Sound, in this photo taken on May 1, 2014.

USFWS reports meager walrus harvest

By Diana Haecker

Walrus harvest numbers reported from Gambell and Savoonga hunters indicate yet another bad walrus hunting season for this year's spring hunt.

Marine Mammals Management Walrus Program Supervisor James MacCracken with the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service reported that only 345 walrus have been reported. Usually, MacCracken said, the number of reported walruses is about 700.

Bad weather and poor ice conditions were blamed for the dismal spring hunting.

Paul Rokok of Savoonga said the harvest was even worse than last year. "The weather and ice was so bad, we didn't even go out and hunt," he said. In terms of fearing another food shortage over the winter, Rokok said it is too early to say because fall hunting still offers the opportunity to harvest walruses.

Last year, a dismal walrus hunt caused a native food shortage on St. Lawrence Island, prompting the State of Alaska to declare an economic disaster, which did very little in terms of alleviating the food shortage. NSEDC and other seafood processors organized a shipment of canned salmon to the island's residents.

MacCracken added that, so far, Nome hunters have not reported any walrus harvests. King Island hunters have reported four walruses. MacCracken added that the average harvest number for Nome is six animals. The highest reported harvest was 20 animals in 2011.

2012 and 2013 reports for Nome list 14 walruses harvested per year.

FUEL DELIVERY — The tanker Atlantic Polaris anchored in Nome's roadstead on July 11.

The Dock Walk

The perfect summer days of last week with sunny skies and calm seas are over. This week began with chilly temperatures, stormy weather and frothy ocean waves. Hence, not much gold digging or fishing was going on as of press time.

From the docks Harbormaster Lucas Stotts reported the following activity at the Port of Nome and the small boat harbor. On July 8, Crowley's vessels Nokea/Nakao departed after discharging fuel. The US Coast Guard cutter SPAR arrived. Brice Construction's landing craft Sam

B/LAB arrived and departed after loading rock and equipment. Alaska Logistics' vessel SeaHawk departed. On July 9, Northland Services' vessel Nunaniq arrived.

On July 10, the Coast Guard Cutter SPAR departed. The Millie Cruz/Baranof Provider arrived and departed for Unalakleet after loading armor stone. The SeaHawk loaded freight and departed.

On July 11, the research vessel Norseman II arrived to fuel up and do a crew change.

On July 12, the Norseman II departed. Alaska Logistics' tug and barge Ocean Mariner/Western Service arrived and discharged freight. The Atlantic Polaris tanker is anchored offshore.

On July 13, the Nokea/Nakao arrived to deliver fuel. The Millie Cruz/Baranof Provider arrived to load more armor stone bound for Inalakleet

On July 14, the tanker Atlantic Polaris departed from Nome and headed back to Korea.

However, a program exists that allows the U.S. DOT to pay for half of the funding, if another funding source provides a match.

In the past, Little Diomede residents remained stranded in Nome or Wales until a seat became open or they were picked up by relatives to embark on a dangerous boat ride from Wales to the island. Acting Mayor of Diomede Isaac Ahkvaluk said the most recent interruption of air service left two people temporarily stranded in Wales, but they were picked up and transported back to Diomede by boat.

On May 28, Governor Sean Parnell signed Alaska's operating budget, which included a $200,000 allocation to the Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development's Division of Community and Regional Affairs for a grant to Kawerak. The grant will pay the 50 percent local share under the contract for the Air Transportation to Non-Eligible Places program for Diomede.

Erickson submitted its proposal on June 4. After soliciting comments from Kawerak, Diomede and the State DCCR, the U.S. DOT issued an order that Erickson was elected to continue the service, that Kawerak has the funding through the state and that the U.S DOT will match the program.

The order says that the program costs $377,520 annually. Kawerak and US DOT equally share the costs at $188,760.

According to Pearl Mikulski, vice president of Community Services with Kawerak, the tri-party agreement paperwork was received on Monday, July 14.

Last year the contract was signed on June 26, offering a seamless transition.

The contract must be renewed each year.

Photos by Diana Haecker KIDS MATTER— Chris Steppe steps up to the plate and brings the Boys and Girls Club dismal financial situation to the attention of spectators enjoying Nome's Fourth of July Parade.

Boys and Girls Club of Nome in need of funding

By Diana Haecker

"We matter" read a sign carried by Chris Steppe during the Fourth of July Parade.

A train of children walking beside and behind him carried similar signs, reading "Support Us" or "B-n-G Club kids rock."

The Nome Boys and Girls Club, that's where kids go. But the club is under financial strain.

Steppe is the director of the Boys & Girls Club of Nome and he's worried about his ability to keep the doors of the club open. "We have 40 kids come almost every day," Steppe said. "But funding for youth programs is harder and harder to come by."

Nome Community Center is the non-profit entity that administers the club's finances and sees to it that it stays in existence.

"For barebones operations to pay the one person on staff and keep up with utilities and building maintenance, we need about $80,000 to $100,000 per year," said Nome Community Center Executive Director Danielle Slingsby.

Having not received any more funding from national Boys & Girls Club of America since 2011, the Nome club is teetering at the brink of existence. "Currently, we're $40,000 underfunded," said Slingsby.

The City of Nome contributes $10,000 to the club. In the past, Sitnasuak Native Corp. contributed

During a July 15 finance committee meeting Sitansuak renewed its commitment to fund the Boys and Girls Club for another year at the same funding level, confirmed Sitnasuak President Chuck Fagerstrom.

Slingsby applied for grants from several sources, but was just recently turned down for a 21st Century Community Learning Grant.

"We need funding for supplies, snacks and one more staff member and part time tutors," Slingsby said. Despite the odds, somehow NCC

The Boys and Girls Club, Slingsby explains, shares the building with the Children's Home, which helps with building maintenance is able to keep the doors open.

Also, a shared grant partially pays for Steppe's salary.

But what money can't buy is the enthusiasm and dedication to the kids that Steppe brings to the job. "The doors are open mostly because of Chris," said Slingsby. "He works his butt off." With only one volunteer helping sometimes, Steppe is mostly alone with 40 to 50 children after school is out during the school year. It is not that busy during the summer break. Then, the Boys & Girls Club sees between 20 and 40 kids daily.

Slingsby said that she tries to coordinate children's activities with Nome Eskimo Community programs and Nome Community Center activities that focus on alcohol, drug and tobacco prevention. "We focus on positive activities," Slingsby said. "Just preaching doesn't help."

Last Friday, Steppe collected one volunteer and a group of 14 kids and took them to fish at the Nome River mouth.

Although they had only six poles, they took turns and managed to land a couple of humpies.

When it was time to pack up and go, Steppe herded some die-hard swimmers out of the water and delivered a happy pack of kids back to the club.

Norton Sound – Kotzebue fish report for mid-July

By Jim Menard, ADF&G

CRAB:

To date 39 permit holders have registered for the open access fishery. Last year 36 permit holders registered and 33 permit holders made at least one delivery during the season. Two permit holders have registered for CDQ fishery. The catch through Sunday morning was 125,000 pounds by 27 permit holders. If the current catch rate continues the GHL will be reached by mid-August. Crabbers are reminded to record the latitude and longitude and tag number of any tagged crab found in crab pots. Sublegal crab must be returned to the water unharmed. Do not rip the tag off because it will kill the crab.

The R/V Pandalus has departed Bristol Bay and is expected to arrive in Nome on the morning of July 15 to begin preparations for triennial Norton Sound crab survey.

Unalakleet holds humpy derby

In memory of Anna Etegeak, the community of Unalakleet held a Humpy Derby on July 5 and 6. It once again was a hit with children, parents, grandparents who showed up rod and reel in hand on the first day at 8 a.m. and fished until 11:30 p.m. The next day started with a community picnic and

The Humpy Derby was created in hope for families to get out and have a fun family time and a healthy weekend dedicated to the children, in honor and appreciation of the Elders.

Francine Johnson coordinated the Derby for the third year. Johnson said that this event takes a lot of multi-tasking and hard dedicated work.

Elders were so very thankful for the cut and ready-to-hang humpies caught and cut by individuals who took the time to help the elders. "Laughter, hugs and thankfulness is one of the rewards from our Elders, it brings pride in one's self-esteem of doing good to our Elders," said Francine Johnson.

Children of all ages turned in fish. In anticipation of the event Johnson said she has received calls from children's parents asking when the derby is, and kids in the community asking, even biking to her residence to ask about when the event will start. The weekend for the derby was warm and sunny.

Prizes for heaviest to lightest were given in four age groups: from ages 1-9; ages 10-17; ages 18-59 and Elders. During the community picnic, hamburgers were served, but since the obligatory watermelons have not yet arrived, Johnson will be having a Watermelon Day when they arrive for the kids in the community.

Gabe Anagick in the age bracket 1-9 years-old and EJ Rochon in the age group 10-17 years-old scored the heaviest humpies, both fish weighing in at 6.06

Marshall Branch fished out the lightest humpy, weighing 1.12 pounds.

TRAPPED (top) — Coast Guard 17th District watchstanders in Juneau were contacted by North Slope Borough Search and Rescue that a man, sailing from Vancouver, Canada, to eastern Canada via the Northwest Passage, needed assistance after his vessel became trapped in the ice. The man had sailed from Nome to the Northwest Passage in his attempt to make it to Turkey.

TOWING (right)— Coast Guard Cutter Healy crewmembers make contact with a mariner aboard his 36-foot sailboat which was trapped in Arctic ice approximately 40 miles northeast of Barrow, Alaska, July 12, 2014.

USCG Cutter Healy rescues sailboat Altan Girl

A U.S. Coast Guard icebreaker came to the rescue of Turkish-Canadian sailor Erkan Gursoy aboard his 36-foot sailboat Altan Girl, which became trapped in Arctic ice last Saturday

On May 29, the sailing vessel Altan Girl arrived in Nome from Canada. Gursoy left Nome a couple of weeks later, planning to sail through the Northwest Passage all the way to Turkey.

Gursoy became stranded about 40 miles northeast of Barrow. The North Slope Borough Search and Rescue on Monday contacted Coast Guard 17th District watchstanders in Juneau. The NSB SAR personnel reported that they were unable to fly to the man's location due to weather conditions and low visibility. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration provided ice and weather forecasts to help responders set a course of action. The Coast Guard diverted the icebreaker Healy from a National Science Foundation funded research mission to rescue the man. The Healy broke a 12-mile path through the Arctic ice with the sailboat in tow and led it to open

The Healy crew conducted a safety inspection of the vessel to ensure the vessel was seaworthy and that all the required safety equipment was on board. According to the Coast Guard, Gursoy was going to sail to Barrow to resupply and await safer weather conditions before continuing his journey.

"This case highlights the important capabilities that Coast Guard multi-mission assets deployed to the Arctic are able to provide to mariners in distress," said Rear Adm. Dan Abel, commander, 17th Coast Guard District. "The Coast Guard 17th District is committed to working with our federal, state, local and tribal partners along with industry to protect the safety of life at sea in Alaska and the Arctic."

The incident prompted a response from U.S. Senator Lisa Murkowski, who wrote in a press release that luck is no substitute for national policy on Arctic security.

"While I realize that an icebreaker is a high cost item, America needs to step up its investment in the Arctic as the waters there open up to possible travel, economic and military activity," Murkowski wrote. "The Altan Girl and its captain were lucky that the Healy icebreaker was nearby conducting a research project and could cut through the ice to rescue him, as helicopters were not an option due to weather."

Murkowski said that former USCG Commandant Admiral Papp told her that he 'lucked out' by having the Healy available when Nome needed its emergency delivery of fuel in January 2012. "Luck is no substitute for national policy, however, and I believe that this weekend's incident proves that we need to move with all possible speed to expand our fleet," Murkowski said.

Nome River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 2,900 - 4,300; Pink 3,200 - Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 2,100 chums, 18,000 pinks and 11 sockeyes. The average historical first quarter point at the weir is July 12 for pinks and July 15 for chums.

Snake River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 1,600-2,500-A cooperative project between Fish & Game and NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 1,300 chums and 2,000 pinks. The average historical first quarter point at the weir is July 15 for pinks and July 16 for chums.

Solomon River Weir – No escapement goals yet established – Fish & Game project.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 300 chums and 2,000 pinks.

Glacial Lake Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey): Sockeye 800 – 1,600 – A cooperative project between and Fish & Game and NSEDC.

A video system is being used exclusively this year and cumulative counts through July 3 were 1,000 sockeyes, 1 beaver and 1 otter.

Port Clarence District

The Pilgrim River and Lower Kuzitrin River closes to all net fishing effective 6 p.m. Monday, July 14. After Monday afternoon, no nets or seines can be put into the Pilgrim River or its tributaries or the Lower Kuzitrin River from 300 yards upstream of the confluence with the Pilgrim River to the mouth of Kuzitrin River.

Pilgrim River Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake & Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake): Sockeye 4,000 – 8,000 – Cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 13 kings, 2,300 chums, 1,500 pinks, and 2,530 sockeyes.

Although the average historical midpoint of sockeye salmon passage at the weir is July 18, last year it was July 12 and this year again may be earlier than the average historical midpoint. To date, age composition data of the escapement this season shows that over half the sockeye salmon sampled are from the parent year of 2008 when over 20,000 sockeyes passed the weir. Age-5 fish from the 2009 sockeye escapement of 950 fish and age-4 fish from the 2010 sockeye salmon escapement of 1,650 fish are starting to appear in the escapement, but will likely not be in enough numbers to reach the escapement goal range unless fishing restrictions are taken. The escapement goal range at Salmon Lake is 4,000 to 8,000 sockeye salmon observed by aerial survey.

Kotzebue
The commercial fishery has had its first two openings and the catch and number of permit holders fishing was the highest since the 1990s. The price of 60 cents a pound for chum salmon was also the highest since the 1990s

Cumulative catch was 14,400 chum salmon by 44 permit holders. Kobuk River Test Fish - Fish &

The crew is scheduled to begin fishing on July 17.

CHIEF'S NOTES: NPD updates and tips for dealing with personal safety

By Nome Police Chief John Papasodora

It certainly has been a busy summer for all involved. The Nome Police Department is nearing full staffing, and our ability to serve your needs as well as to provide proactive programs is within view. All of us at the Nome Police are looking forward to continued prompt and professional service to our community. Over the last sixmonths we have hired and trained Officer Lance McElroy; Officer James Edson; and Officer Joseph Dickerson. In addition, Sergeant Nick Harvey has been promoted to Sergeant and is doing a fine job in his new capacity.

Recently, Officer Justin Timm attended Police Canine Handler Training in Alabama. He returned with our newest member of the department, K9 Icon. Justin and Icon will become an integral part of our drug awareness, prevention, and enforcement platform. I look forward to the presentations he and Icon will provide to our local schools and civic groups; as well as increasing our ability to detect drugs while apprehending those who are dealing.

Now a few words about per-

Alaska has the highest per capita rates of sexual assault and domestic abuse in the nation.

The Nome Police Department has received about 11 reports of sexual assault between Jan 1 and Jul 14 of each year (average from 2008 to 2014). The vast majority of these cases involve intoxicated persons who go home with someone they may or may not know, and wake up the next morning not being able to remember the events that occurred while they were intoxicated, including intercourse. In some cases, a victim will wake up unable to remember how they got where they were, or what they did.

There is no excuse why a perpetrator would think it's OK to have intercourse with someone who is unable to give knowing consent, and we do our best to bring each of these cases to a logical conclusion and refer those cases that produce evidence to the District Attorney for review. But in doing so, we have to prove that consent was not given, which is difficult when all parties were very intoxicated.

Since 2009, I have sent the message that alcohol has significant effects on our community. Sexual assault is just one of these affects. I have sent the message that friends need to look out for one another; someone should stay sober to make sure each member of your group gets home safely; and everyone should drink responsibly - knowing their limit and when to stop. But this message needs to be reinforced, because the police can't be in every house, or with every person to insure their personal safety. People need to look after their friends, family, and those they care about -even strangers.

There is little that is as devastating as being the victim of sexual assault and sexual abuse. Many don't report because they fear that nobody will believe them; that they will be ridiculed; or that in some way, being a 'victim' is wrong. A victim of sexual assault will continue to live with the trauma for years, sometimes affecting every aspect of their life, including relationships with those who are close to them.

Addressing this problem will require that all persons are accountable. Know your limits. Have a good time, but arrive home safely. Sometimes this will require the help of your friends, your family, or even the police. Have a designated person who stays sober and makes sure everyone gets home safely. This is more than a 'designated driver' it is a good friend who will make sure you are safe.

Don't go anywhere to 'party' with people you don't know.

Don't sleep at someone's house or 'pass out' if there is not someone there to insure your safety.

Don't accept rides from people that you don't know and always let someone know who you are with and where you are going.

Don't take chances and hope everything will be OK.

I've heard the expression that it takes an entire village to raise a child. It also takes an entire community to make sure that that child stays safe, even in adulthood. Help us to help you to stay safe.

All guns are always loaded:

As you will see from the Seawall, we had a case where the owner of a firearm was getting ready to clean his weapon and discharged a round. Though nobody was injured, this does warrant a few words about and planning

firearm safety.

During the course of my 29-years in law enforcement, I have been involved in similar cases where the discharged round strikes the person with the gun; another person in the room; or exits the structure and strikes someone in an adjacent structure. There was a recent case in North Pole where a two-year-old was killed under similar circumstances, and I have responded to numerous cases where a firearm is discharged from one location, goes through several walls, exits the residence and then enters another residence, sticking an occupant. Though many of us would never consider taking an aimed shot at a mile or more, modern ammunition can injure or kill a person for up to a mile; or penetrate multiple structures depending on the caliber and ammunition. With house/apartments so close together in Nome, this can be a significant hazard.

I would encourage all persons who handle firearms to seek training in the safe handling of those firearms. The Nome Sportsman Association is a good source for material as is the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. If you are uncertain how to check a firearm to see if it is loaded, or how to properly and safely unload the weapon, please give us a call at 443-5262 and we will assist you in making the weapon

The following are basic rules for firearm safety:

1. All guns are always loaded.

Saying It Sincerely

By Pastor Charles Brower Community United Methodist Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

The pink salmon (humpback salmon) provide several hours of pleasurable time as well as providing meals for our table. I get to contemplate the many graces God gives us while casting: beauty of the Seward Peninsula, serenity, new similar-minded friends, and the excitement of a fish on! The joy of gutting and filleting the fish, sharing with others, and the eventual packaging and freezing for later consumption add to my overall enjoyment. Jesus calls his first disciples (Matthew 4)

<sup>18</sup> As Jesus was walking beside the Sea of Galilee, he saw two brothers, Simon called Peter and his brother Andrew. They were casting a net into the lake, for they were fishermen. <sup>19</sup> "Come, follow me," Jesus said, "and I will send you out to fish for people." <sup>20</sup> At once they left their nets and followed

<sup>21</sup> Going on from there, he saw two other brothers, James son of Zebedee and his brother John. They were in a boat with their father Zebedee, preparing their nets. Jesus called them, 22 and immediately they left the boat and their father and followed him.

The vision of The United Methodist Church is making disciple for the transformation of the world. Jesus set the standard we attempt to emulate in calling fishermen to ministry. All of us are called to "Do good. Do no harm. Love God." While you enjoy our wonderful land, rivers, and oceans; take time to reflect on what God is doing with you. Amen.

Nome Rotary honors Little Sisters of Jesus as Citizens of the Year

The Little Sisters of Jesus in Diomede and Nome were named the Rotary Citizens of the Year. The award was announced at 4th of July festivities and presented at a Wednesday July 9 Rotary Club meeting at the Polar Cafe.

A statement from the Rotary Club says, "These compassionate ladies have worked with us, lived with us and kept up with us almost all their lives and have showed us the way to live with dignity and grace every minute of the time. They have led exemplary lives in demonstrating their humility and the purpose we each have in living to the best of our ability. In their quiet way, they have shown that it doesn't take great wealth, or even great effort to live a good life in Nome. There were seven who dedicated over 25 years here and numerous more who spent years of their lives being a part of our community. They are leaving Nome this year. This award from the Rotary Club of Nome is our way of saying we noticed all the good things they did and the good feelings they are leaving us with."

house," Charlie Weiss said. Weiss lives near East End Park where one may see members of the herd standing among the tables under the picnic shelter.

Figuring a solution is his job, Gorn said, but he could use some help from the public to keep them safe, regardless of how they feel about the animals:

"For the real bona fide concerns, there things we can do," he said. "We can put up chain link fences that are secured effectively because we know it works. We can knock down brush. We have to have some common sense."

He sees humans around Nome taking chances and behaving in ways they never would consider around moose or bear.

"I'm really, really, scared about people doing really [unwise] things this summer and in summers past" Gorn said. While they never would intentionally go near a bear, or go near a moose, they are risking injury with their behavior around musk ox, he added.

"They go much too close, some are darn near climbing on their backs. Some kids in town are shooting at them, real close," Gorn said.

Most people have shown good judgment. Musk oxen have shown humans considerable forbearance.

Musk ox have been tolerant of humans almost to a fault, encouraging people to take risks. "We've had around 100 musk ox in and around Nome this summer and no issues [with humans]," Gorn said.

When it comes to conflict between animals and humans, "I'm worried about a cow moose. There's an aggressive animal," Gorn declared.

Gorn said his department takes all wild animal calls seriously.

'We're working on it. We have to figure out what happened. This is new for Nome," he said.

Gorn is responding to calls from police and residents near the airport and roads.

The department herds musk ox almost daily, Gorn thinks his log shows over 20 responses where he's moved animals between the hours of 11 p.m. and 5 a.m.

Biologists think the musk ox see Nome as a safe haven from bears.

They believe brown bears have taken many calves and lowered the muskox population, but they aren't

For almost 40 years, the musk ox population has grown without local problems, according to Gorn.

"Now the population is declining," he said. "We have 10 years of low recruitment rates.'

Biologists may have to concentrate on brown bears as a way to discourage musk ox from seeking shelter among the human population.

"The solution may take time. We may have to take it to the bears in GMU 22C and lower the bear numbers," he said. "We have a pretty liberal hunt in 22C. Over the last two years we've had a pretty low harvest. We may have to encourage some hunting of bears."

"It's hard for me to believe the Seward Peninsula, as large as it is, and Unit 22 itself being 24,000 sq. miles, out of 24,000 sq. miles the musk ox are naturally selecting Icy View,"

ITCHY MUSK OX - Musk oxen take advantage all the amenities Nome has to offer, including safety from predators such as wolves or bears and conveniently located poles such as this badminton net pole at East End Park which makes for a fine scratching post.

Gorn said. "We have research that shows musk ox move closer to town when bears predate on their calves during May.

Icy View is Nome's suburb two miles out of town that musk ox seem to prefer over other hangouts. While they are there, they have attacked dogs, rattled kennel enclosures and meandered through yards right up close to houses.

Gorn doesn't see moving an entire population of musk oxen as an answer. There are thousands of musk ox in the game unit that are not problems, only 100 to 150 grazing in Nome. It is almost impossible to move entire populations, he said.

Peter Bente, a biologist with state Fish and Game agrees that residents should remember that musk ox are wild animals. Being in Nome is new for them, too, Bente pointed out. In town they are in a situation where they can get cornered in yards and fences, producing a desire to charge humans, he said.

From a statewide perspective, there's urban wildlife, there's nuisance wildlife cases all over the state, whether its moose, or bears.

"We have to figure out what's going on here. Statewide, it has been going on for decades," Gorn said.

"It's just really new for Nome. I don't have the silver bullet to solve it yet, but we're working on it."

NJUS grapples with rising power generation costs

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Joint Utility System board voted to increase the fuel surcharge on oil it is feeding into its generators to light the town.

At a penny a kilowatt, the increase slated for the July billing will take ratepayers' costs up by $5 per 500 kilowatts.

Sagging revenue numbers tell him that Nome Joint Utility System needs to raise the fuel surcharge to the extent allowed by the current NJUS tariff, said John K. Handeland, utility manager. That means raising the charge to 21.51 cents, replacing the current 20.5 cents.

The increase would put $182,000 into the utility's budget, the utility manager, said.

The fuel surcharge accommodates rises in fuel prices. Based on 2014 fuel projections, the total cost per gallon for new fuel received was $3.663, which would have raised the surcharge to 22.5 cents per kilowatt, a raise of two cents. However, factoring in lower cost fuel already on hand plus a rebate for fuel that tested below BTU values in the 2013 supply lowered the average total cost per gallon to $3.5387, halving the increase to one cent per gallon.

The board approved the increase July 16, but they were degrees cooler than lukewarm on the issue. The rising cost of electric power has them stymied.

The board held their own feet to the fire as well as Handeland's, with their oft-expressed—but unsatisfied—concern that a continued increase in utility costs would drive ratepayers out of town.

A continuing increase in power costs would cause ratepayers to start turning off lights and to slow down their meters in other ways, with the result that kilowatt sales would droop, bringing down revenue.

The revenue increase expected from rate increases wouldn't happen,

Berda Willson, board chairwoman observed.

Fewer kilowatt sold

The revenue from kwh sales was already down from 2013 by 10 percent, Handeland said Monday. A major impact occurred when Rock Creek Mine shut. A comparison of figures for January to June 30, year on year, showed that, although the mine did not operate last year, maintenance, running pumps and the like, had added to NJUS' bottom line.

Add in energy saving moves by residents like installing LED light bulbs and the City's installation of LED street lighting.

They thought the electric bills would come down when the two giant wind turbines went up on Banner Ridge, board members said, but they have not. When the 900-kilowatted turbines started to spin, the

Bear and musk ox dispatched in defense of life and property

By Diana Haecker

Last week, on two separate occasions, a grizzly bear and a musk ox were taken in defense of life and property inside of Nome City limits.

On Tuesday, July 15 at 2:30 a.m., a Checker Cab driver flagged down a Nome police patrol car and reported having seen a brown bear near Belmont Point Cemetery and the dog lots at Nome Gold land, according to Nome Police Chief John Papasodora. NPD notified Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game personnel. Bill Dunker, Fish and Wildlife Technician with the department, responded.

According to Dunker, he received the information that several loose dogs chased a bear in the vicinity of the AC store, the cemetery and the northern side of Little Creek Road. He met up with Nome police officers Justin Timm and Jim Edson and together they searched the area for the bear, initially to no avail.

Dunker then drove north on the Nome-Beltz Highway and spotted the bear at Nome musher Kirsten Bey's dog yard. He saw the bear had gotten into a container that stored dog food.

Dunker called the NPD officers in and together they tried to run off the bear by making loud noises, but that didn't have the desired effect. "At one point it looked like the bear was approaching one of the dogs," Dunker said. That triggered the decision to dispatch the bear. Dunker and one of the NPD officers shot the animal.

The animal was classified as taken in defense of life and property. Its hide and skull were salvaged and sent to Fairbanks to be processed. Dunker said the hide will be auctioned off at the Fur Rondy in Anchorage.

As for lessons learned, Dunker said the public should not store food, trash, animal parts or fish outside as those items may attract bears. Once habituated to finding food near human settlements, those bears are likely to become nuisance animals and most likely will be shot to protect humans.

Kirsten Bey said she was out of town when the incident occurred.

Her dog sitter texted her what had occurred when he came in the morning to find the food container knocked over and about 20 pounds of dog kibble scattered next to it.

Valuable lessons learned in Teller oil spill response drill

Only rarely do oil spill removal organizations, OSRO for short, embrace bad weather, rough seas and uncooperative elements.

But in the case of Alaska Chadux, the OSRO that set out last Wednesday to test how fast they could get oil spill response equipment from Nome to Teller, bad weather was just what they wanted and what yielded good results in terms of lessons learned.

Alaska Chadux conducted a drill that simulated an oil spill at Port Clarence.

The drill was one component of a three-part exercise to test oil spill response plans in place for Chadux members, consisting of operators of marine vessels transporting fuel in state waters, companies that operate large oil storage facilities and commercial fishing fleets.

Part one of the exercise was a barge equipment deployment held in Homer in May. It simulated the initial response actions to be taken by onboard crew and Chadux responders as they arrived on scene.

Part two was a tabletop exercise held in June. It involved an incident management team comprised of personnel from seven member companies. They were tasked to create a response plan to clean up oil during a Teller scenario.

Part three was to test the logistics of getting oil spill response equipment stored in connexes in Nome to Teller.

The intent of all three exercises was to test member response capa-

Well, another summer has just about reached the halfway point, with a nice June and just OK, July. The weather has been better than last year to be sure, but hoping for more sunshine.

Everything is in full swing, with the airport improvements, road repair, gold mining and crabbing fleets coming and going, my favorite time of year.

I've been following a story of David versus Goliath in The Nugget the past month with interest, and would like to make a few comments.

It seems that some of our city council members would like to change not just the rules, but also the sprit of the "process" of awarding the Fire Department maintenance contract.

Matt Johnson vs. Rolland Trowbridge. Sure, Matt Johnson (Goliath), Fire Chief, family man and neighbor. He's a good guy; some of us grew up with and went to school with him and have known Matt all their lives, and have had work done in his shop over the years and as the volunteer fire dept. chief, admire his dedication and commitment to public service. Heck, I've known Matt for years, and have had work done several times on my old truck over the past 30 years I've lived in Nome.

But to award this contract on that bases, is neither right nor fair.

On the other hand let's look at Rolland Trowbridge (David) He's only been in Nome for a few years; most of us don't know him at all. We just know he is a new guy, trying to take a job away from our friend. Sure he went through the process just like Matt to bid on the contract, but we don't know him!

Well, I had an opportunity to meet Rolland this past month. My old pick up broke down and needed some work. I've been to every shop in town over the years, and I had heard there as a new shop in town and decided to go there.

I must say the work was first class, his shop clean, he and his employees were polite and professional AND he was a little cheaper.

While talking to him I found him to be smart, and very unassuming. He mentioned that had moved here from the East Coast and had stopped in Nome on his way to San Francisco. (How do you stop in Nome on your way to SF?)

Well, he sailed a boat from the

Welcome to Nome Rolland, you bring the sprit, attitude and search for adventure that most of us were looking for when we made the decision to locate here.

Nancy, I just wanted to even the battle up a little bit, I can see both sides, but what's right is right, we need to let Rolland have this contract, he bid on it fair and square, by the rules! If he can't do the work, that's another story.

And Matt, love you brother, but as the Fire Chief of Nome, you need to be fair and honest, while working with your competition in the auto repair business pair business.

Let's all pray for some more sunshine. It's not easy living in Nome!

Retired Admiral Robert Papp to serve as U.S. Special Representative for the Arc-

In a press statement Secretary of State John Kerry announced the appointment of retired U.S. Coast Guard Admiral Robert Papp as Special Representative for the Arctic.

"President Obama and I are committed to elevating Arctic issues in America's foreign policy and national security strategy because the United States is an Arctic nation, and Arctic policy has never been more important, particularly as we prepare to Chair the Arctic Council in 2015," Kerry said.

Admiral Papp served with great distinction as Commandant of the Coast Guard and retird in May after a stellar thirty-nine-year career. As Commandant, Papp navigated a difficult budget environment to recapitalize the Coast Guard's fleet, working with Congress to secure funding to complete five of eight National Security Cutters and to refurbish and restore the Polar Star heavy icebreaker to service.

Kerry also announced the appointment of Fran Ulmer as special counsel to Papp. "I am also extraordinarily grateful that in our efforts, I will be able to rely on senior advice from a remarkable Alaskan, former Lieutenant Governor Fran Ulmer who, as President Obama's Chair of the U.S. Arctic Research Commission, will provide invaluable counsel as a Special Advisor on Arctic Science and Policy," said Kerry.

Admiral Papp will soon travel to Alaska to consult with policy-mak-

Kerry said the Arctic region is the last global frontier and a region with enormous and growing geostrategic, economic, climate, environment, and national security implications for the United States and the world. "With the team we're building at the State Department, we will make sure that the United States is in the strongest possible position to meet these challenges and seize these opportunities," he said.

Revised Magnuson-Stevens draft under public review

A revised draft of the Magnuson-Stevens Act reauthorization legislation is now available online for public review and comment, said U.S. Senator Mark Begich, chair of the Senate Subcommittee on Oceans, Atmosphere, Fisheries and Coast Guard.

The MSA is the primary federal law that governs marine fisheries management in U.S. waters.

"This shorter, revised draft incorporates many comments from Alaskans and others around the nation who responded to our initial discussion draft in April," said Begich. "I hope the public will review these changes and get back to me soon so we can advance to the next step in the process."

Begich noted that the current MSA version is still in draft form pending a formal introduction of an amended bill. The public will still be able to comment as the bill is taken up by Begich's subcommittee, and marked up by the full Commerce Committee before moving to the Senate floor for action. Any Senate version of MSA must then be reconciled with the House version.

Begich held several MSA hearings around the nation and six listening sessions for Alaskans.

The revised MSA discussion draft can be found at http://www.commerce.senate.gov/public/?a=Files.Se rve&File id=645df928-1aee-416dbb82-8739b0ad3656.

EPA releases proposal to protect Bristol Bay, Alaska fisheries from potential impacts

The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency Region 10 issued a proposal to protect one of the world's most valuable salmon fisheries from the risks posed by large-scale mining at the Pebble deposit, the agency announced last week.

In a press release the EPA said that science has shown that development of the proposed Pebble mine, which is backed by Northern Dynasty Minerals and the Pebble Limited Partnership, would be one of the largest open pit copper mines in the world and would threaten one of the world's most productive salmon fish-

EPA Region 10 is seeking public comments on the proposal.

The Bristol Bay watershed is an area of exceptional ecological value with salmon productivity unrivaled anywhere in North America. The region's streams, wetlands, lakes and ponds provide intact habitat that supports all five species of Pacific salmon found in North America: coho, Chinook, sockeye, chum, and pink. These salmon populations are critical to the health of the entire ecosystem, which is home to more than 20 other fish species, 190 bird species, and more than 40 terrestrial mammal species, including bears, moose, and caribou.

Bristol Bay supports commercial, subsistence and recreational fisheries worth hundreds of millions in economic yield each year and create thousands of jobs.

"Bristol Bay is an extraordinary ecosystem that supports an ancient fishing culture and economic powerhouse," said Dennis McLerran, Regional Administrator for EPA Region 10. "The science is clear that mining the Pebble deposit would cause irreversible damage to one of the world's last intact salmon ecosystems. Bristol Bay's exceptional fisheries deserve exceptional protection. We are doing this now because we've heard from concerned tribes, the fishing industry, Alaskans and many others who have lived and worked for more than a decade under the uncertainty posed by this potentially destructive mine. Simply put, this will be a uniquely large mine in a uniquely important place.

EPA Region 10 is seeking public comment on its proposal from July 21 to Sept. 19, 2014, and will hold public meetings in Alaska from August 12-15.

The Clean Water Act generally requires a Section 404 permit from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers before any person places dredged or fill material into streams, wetlands, lakes and ponds. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers authorizes those EPA has used its 404(c) authority sparingly, beginning the process in 30 instances and completing it only 13 times in the 42-year history of the Clean Water Act. EPA use of its authority has typically involved major projects with significant impacts on some of America's most ecologically valuable waters.

The EPA determination is under public review and an Anchorage hearing is tentatively scheduled for Tuesday, Aug 12. Other hearings are planned for Dillingham and villages in the region.

Bill signed to boost investment in Arctic

Last week, Governor Sean Parnell signed Senate Bill 140 designed to boost infrastructure development in the Arctic. SB140 creates incentives to attract private investment to build ports, roads, emergency and telecommunications projects in the Alaskan Arctic. SB140 came out of the work by the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission.

"Over the last year-and-a-half of meetings with the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission (AAPC), we had vast discussions regarding how we can craft an Arctic policy for Alaskans, and what that policy will look like. All things pointed to infrastructure as the foundation, and all of the identified steps forward required a financing mechanism," said Senator Lesil McGuire.

"This is that mechanism. It will attract the private investment that we need while sending the message to the Federal Government that we feel fortifying and strengthening our assets in the Arctic is critical and we are not afraid to lead this massive undertaking.'

SB 140 authorizes the Alaska Industrial Development and Export Authority's to extend loans, loan guarantees, bonds and bond guarantees to develop infrastructure in the

"The private sector should lead investment, but many times shared infrastructure is best funded by government. SB 140 is the best of both worlds: it creates state-backed incentives to attract private investment," said Representative Herron. "Senator McGuire and I, as Cochairs of the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission, are trying to convince the federal government to step up on the big investments needed in the Arctic: a deep water port, roads, airports, telecommunications, etc. In the meantime, this bill allows the state to lead by example, and I'm really proud of what the Legislature has produced here and applaud the Governor for approving this important legislation.'

The Alaska Arctic Policy Commission's final report to the Legislature is due in January of 2015.

energy produced from wind would reduce the need to burn costly diesel fuel in the thirsty 5.5-megawatt Wartsila generators. So far, the utility is not using the wind generators at full capacity.

"How can we better use the wind generators?" Berda Willson, board chair wondered. "Right now we don't see any benefit. We don't see any dollar amount relating to the use of wind."

Handeland explained that the kilowatts produced by wind had kept electric rate increases to a minimum.

Do the math

Using the energy that wind turbines are spinning out at a dime a kilowatt was more complex than just subtracting wind energy from the community's demand and flipping the diesel generators up and down to provide the difference. Variation in wind speed and direction accounts for only a small part of the math problem.

The community uses less energy for various reasons, power plant operators do not want to operate the 5.2 megawatt Finnish Wartsila generators at less than 3.1 megawatts (60 percent of its capacity), because they will lose their kilowatts-per-gallon of diesel efficiency, increasing costs and rates.

"Therefore we are not always able to use all the wind kilowatts because we need to maintain the diesel generators at a certain percent of capability to stay in the fuel efficiency curve," Handeland said.

A component of the wind generator program is to reintroduce the utility's smaller generators into the system to fine tune wind integration into the diesel percentage, Handeland said. NJUS intended to use two Caterpillar units (3.4 megawatts and 1.8 megawatts) as emergency standby generators only. However, now NJUS has had the units modified with replacement switchgear and electronic controls. Testing has begun to get the generators recertified under DEC permitting. Once sufficient commissioning testing and monitoring has occurred, plant operators will activate automatic integration into the system.

"When we add the sources together and average them for top efficiency, we will be able to keep rates the same," Handeland said.

Still, there is another factor affecting the energy cost computation.

In order to place the large turbines at Banner Peak in optimum wind conditions, NJUS entered into a 20-year agreement with Banner Wind to provide power to the NJUS grid. Banner, a partnership between Bering Straits Native Corp. and Sitnasuak Native Corp. installed 18 generators of 50-kilowatt capacity on Banner Peak.

Effective Jan. 1, NJUS will assume control of the entire site through a land use agreement that includes operation of any Banner wind generator assets that remain. NJUS has a current contractual obligation to buy all the power produced by the Banner Integrity wind turbines standing with the utility's two EWT turbines. On Jan. 1, the power purchase agreement will expire.

Meanwhile, until Jan. 1, NJUS must buy and use power generated by the Banner Integrity turbines first, reducing the amount that can be used from the NJUS EWT generators, to stay within efficient diesel operation levels.

When NJUS erected the generators a year ago, utility management said the 164-foot EWT generators could save NJUS anywhere from 250,000 to 450,000 gallons of fuel in power generation annually. The tab for tapping the wind came to around $9.069 million. The money did not come from ratepayers.

The lion's share, $8.069 came from state grants from Alaska Energy Authority's Rural Energy Fund.

On Monday noon, the Nome Joint Utility System board approved a resolution urging the Nome Common Council to OK a project budget to spend the $1 million in its Community Energy Fund.

The perception of rate payers was that wind was going to reduce the rates by reducing the amount of fuel the utility needed to satisfy the town's power needs, Willson said.

Wind generation had replaced a substantial amount of fuel oil, but costs associated with financing, tank maintenance, pollution control/spill training and handling were calculated into the price, as was depreciation, Handeland said.

These costs remain the same, despite lowered fuel use.

"The cost of filling the tanks has gone up. We have to pay for it," he added.

The board wants to investigate a number of possibilities for curbing electric power costs. How do other utilities operating wind generators integrate them into the system to lower the cost of energy?

Maybe NJUS could offer a rebate to customers based on savings generated by the wind turbines, Pat Knodel, board member, suggested.

NJUS could go into the fuel business, board members Carl Emmons and Fred Moody agreed.

"We could burn our own fuel. We have diesel vehicles. We might as well take advantage of it," Moody said.

The Dock Walk

Stormy weather and rough seas were the story of last week. This makes for a short Dock Walk as vessels were hiding inside the harbor to wait out the storm.

On July 15, Harbormaster Lucas Stotts reports no vessel movement. On July 16, the U.S. Coast Guard cutter Spar arrived and left again due to swells at the docks. The landing craft Millie Cruz departed with armor rock and headed to Unalakleet. On July 17, Brice Construction's tug and barge Sam B/Lab arrived and departed for fuel deliveries. Alaska Logistics' barge Ocean Mariner depart after discharging cargo.

U.S. Coast Guard Spar returned to Nome. The sailing vessel Balthazar departed and headed south to Sand Point after spending the winter in Nome. Alaska Logistic's tug Kaktovik departed.

On July 18, the Kaktovik returned to Nome due to weather. The sailing vessel Artika departed and headed north to attempt the Northeast Sea Route, sailing along the Russian coast line. The sail boat had spent the winter in Nome. Crowley's barge Pt. Thompson departed.

On July 19 through 21, there was no movement in or out of the harbor. Stotts reported that on bad weather days, he and his staff caught up on paper work. "The Port office is just as busy, if not more busy when we have bad weather," Stotts said.

In addition to paperwork, Harbor staff need to deal with everyone's dredges and skiffs that are left unattended and cause damages to others.

"I find myself very busy as weather usually causes delays in my scheduling of large traffic. When one vessel misses their window, it compacts the rest of the week or the month.

Storms during bad weather have a tendency to cause our water levels to rise and cause some dredges anchored, to drift away, which need to be rescued or cause them to drift into others," Stotts described.

Sale of 'Spice' against the law

On Wednesday last week, Governor Sean Parnell signed Senate Bill 173 in Anchorage into law.

Senate Bill 173 makes misleading packaging illegal and establishes fines of $500 per package.

The law stops the sale of illicit synthetic drugs by banning misleading statements on packaging.

Synthetic drugs are often used as alternatives to marijuana and cocaine. They are sold legally in stores statewide as potpourri, bath salts, plant food, and even iPod cleaners.

"The real truth here is 'Spice' is not nice," said bill sponsor Senator Kevin Meyer. "Kids and parents see it sold legally in stores, and they think it is OK, but it's not. 'Spice' is very dangerous and responsible for hundreds of deaths every year in the United States. It is my hope this new approach for keeping it off store shelves will make a big impact."

The new law requires 'Spice' packaging to include labels, which specifically state what is contained in the packets, the intended use and the name of the manufacturer.

The packaging cannot be "false or misleading" and must carry accurate directions for use.

The penalty for possession is $500 per packet.

"This is a rabbit I have been chasing for many years. Despite our best efforts to outlaw the most common chemicals, manufacturers changed the compounds slightly to make them legal," said Senator Meyer.

"That's why we needed to take a new approach and focus on stopping the sale of these dangerous drugs based on their misleading packaging."

ORIENTATION — Alaska Chadux response manager Colin Daugherty, far left, explains to DEC, industry and community observers that bad weather was actually good for the drill as it forced the response team to think of alternatives to deploy boom and response equipment in Teller, during a drill on July 16.

bilities in the Northwest Arctic response region. The state is divided into 10 response regions. Part three focused on logistics and the so-called geographic response strategy, GRS for short.

The Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation initiated the drill to see if the GRS in place for the Northwest Arctic region could stand the test of reality.

The DEC mandates that operators of fuel transportation companies must have a contingency plan and the agency is charged to help develop and approve those plans, which are updated every five years. In most cases, fuel transports also take place in the Exclusive Economic Zone, a sea zone beyond the 3-mile state zone that extend from the coast to 200 nautical miles out at sea. Contingency plans for those fuel transports are approved by the U.S. Coast Guard and the Environmental Protection Agency.

John Kotula works in the DEC's Spill Prevention and Response Division under the industry preparedness program and manages the marine vessel section. Kotula explained that marine vessels transporting fuel need detailed plans to prevent oil spills and, in the worst-case scenario, to contain, control and recover spilled product to protect environmental sensitive areas such as Grantley Harbor.

Transport and deployment

The drill involved deploying oil spill response equipment stored in connex boxes in Nome to Teller. A Q-Trucking semi truck hauled a trailer with two connex vans, multiple pick-up trucks loaded with orange boom and a boat trailer with one of Nome's fishing skiffs were hauled to Teller. In addition, trucks and vans with observers embarked on the 70-mile trip.

The complexity of the oil spill response became clear as the convoy of observers reached the pebbly beach at Teller's Grantley Harbor. In addition to the Alaska Chadux response team and their contractors, several representatives from fuel transporting industry were present, three DEC officials, two Coast Guard officers, Teller Traditional Council President Wesley Okbaok and several other Teller residents.

Other observers included Kawerak Inc. Subsistence Director Brandon Ahmasuk, UAF's Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield and Nanuuq Commission Executive Director Jack Omelak and staff, and two media reporters.

The response team left Nome at 7:45 a.m. By the time the observers arrived at noon, the team had already assessed that it was too dangerous to deploy boom across channel between the Teller sand spit and the Brevig Mission side. Instead, a washout in the Teller sandspit was used to demonstrate how the boom works. Alaska Chadux Response Manager Colin Daugherty said that the bad weather was perfect as it forced responders to quickly assess and come up with alternative plans.

Wesley Okbaok was busy informing the crew about details such as currents and their behavior in certain wind conditions. Okbaok was more than happy to share his knowledge.

Troopers suspend search efforts for missing Brevig Mission man

The search for missing Clarence Ray Olanna has been suspended, troopers said on Monday evening.

Alaska State Troopers received a report by the Brevig Mission VPSO that Clarence Ray Olanna, 21, of Brevig Mission has is missing. According to troopers, he did not alert his family of any travel plans.

According to AST, Olanna was last seen around 1 a.m. on Tuesday, July 15

The Nome AST post was notified at 7:30 p.m.

On Wednesday, July 16, searchers found Olanna's pants, socks, shirt and jacket left in a pile on the beach in front of town.

On Thursday, July 17, five boats, two four-wheelers and an Army National Guard Blackhawk searched the area. According to AST, the Blackhawk flew for two and a half hours over land and water surrounding Brevig Mission.

The next day, volunteers in boats and ATVs continued searching without results.

On July 19, gusty winds again prevented boats to be launched, but searchers used four-wheelers to search for signs of Olanna from Brevig Mission to Lost River point.

As of Monday, July 21, searchers on two four-wheelers kept searching and were about to be joined by more "The weather has greatly hampered waterborne and air borne searching," wrote AST spokeswoman Beth Ipsen in an email to the Nugget. The search is limited to people on four wheelers and walking along the coast. Two people brought a seal net from Shishmaref, but it hasn't been used because of the bad weather and stormy sea conditions.

Troopers suspended the search on Monday, 6 p.m, but local SAR continue to look for Olanna.

Brevig Mission Search & Rescue is in need of donations of food and supplies. Donations can be dropped off at Kawerak, where they will be consolitated and taken to Bering Air or Ravn to be shipped to Brevig.

Brevig Mission SAR requested monetary donations to compensate for gas, sandwich meats, bread, crackers, coffee, cookies, tea, sugar and paperplates, plastic cups and plastic utensils.

Juvenile reaches plea deal in 2012 musk oxen killings

By Diana Haecker

On Friday, one of two children accused of wanton waste killing of seven musk oxen and of harassing musk oxen near Brevig Mission reached a plea deal with state prosecutors

The child, identified by his initials W.O., pleaded guilty to the charges.

The plea deal included the forfeiture of W.O. family's ATV and the forfeiture of guns used in the September 2012 slaughter.

The deal included a $3,000 fine. According to the Alaska restitution statute setting the penalty for violations, the fine would be $3,000 per animal killed in wanton waste. The fine amount, in this case, was reduced taking into the account the young age of the defendant.

According to charging papers, seven musk oxen were killed and left to rot in September 2012. The juveniles involved were charged with seven counts of wanton waste of a big game animal, seven counts of hunting without proper permits and one count of using a motorized vehicle to harass, drive, herd or molest

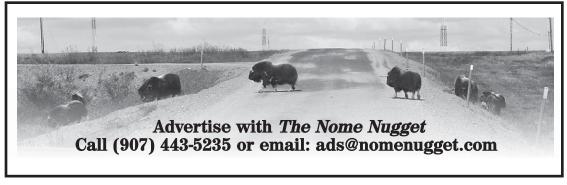

W.O. was 12 years old when he and another, a 10-year-old, over several days, used four-wheelers to chase the musk oxen, then shot into the herd with several .270 and .22 rifle shots, wounding several ani-

W.O. admitted to having shot a musk ox with his 20-gauge shotgun and using the shotgun to "finish off" the musk oxen they had wounded.

On Sept. 29, 2012 Alaska Wildlife Trooper Jay Sears was notified of dead musk oxen found near Brevig Mission and investigated the case. He found two bulls and five cows dead in the Fish River and California Creek drainages.

The other child's case is still pending.

"We are happy they are here to keep our waters safe," he said. Because of the rain and the rough weather, most subsistence fishers were at Tuksuk Channel to fish and not one net was seen in the water.

Under certain circumstances, Okbaok said, currents run right alongside the shore. The Alaska Chadux response team consisting of eight team members used this information to set the boom right on shore to simulate the collection of oil transported by current along the shore line to one area, where it would be skimmed off

Inside Grantley Harbor, near the tank farm, a cascading boom system was set up to demonstrate how spilled oil would be guided to an area where a skimmer would clean the water surface of the oil. The skimmer would pump the oil into a temporary collection tank with a capability of taking on 1,200 gallons of product. In a real oil spill scenario, Daugherty explained, the oil would then be pumped out into another collection tank and hauled off for disposal.

Booms fail if it has no angle into current. Setting the boom to cross the washout didn't allow for an angle into the current, explained Daugherty. "If deployed correctly, boom can work in 7 knot currents, but waves larger than two feet will spill oil over boom," he said. On scene, a 10-inch orange boom was strung across the 200-ft, washout.

But what if oil would escape under and over the boom?

Chadux General Manager Matt Melton explained that in a real case scenario, bigger boom would be deployed, but for the ease of demonstration, the smaller diameter boom was used in this drill.

With the rough seas of Port Clarence to the west and the calmer waters of Grantley Harbor to the East, and a raging channel in between, the challenge to protect the inside of the harbor became clear.

Contain, control, recover

Melton said Chadux's role is to protect and clean up. "In a real scenario, we would be attacking out there," he said, pointing to Port Clarence. In case of a spill, the responsible party would first boom off their ship to contain the oil. Another ship that may be Chadux member could also come to aid in the initial response to boom off the leaking ship. This part was practiced in a drill that took place in Homer in May, Melton said. The drill in Teller was all about testing logistics. "It's simple to put boom in the water," said Melton. "The tricky part is to get boom in the right place in a quick and efficient manner."

Once alerted to a real spill, Chadux would make an assessment and put responders on a plane to Nome and haul equipment to Teller. At first, responders would aid the spilling vessel to contain the oil. Simultaneously, Chadux would dispatch larger vessels from Nome to sail to Teller in order to assist booming off the leaking vessel. In Nome, Chadux stores 3,000 feet of larger boom (20-26 inch in diameter), 300 feet of so called river boom (8 to 12 inches), an aluminum work skiff, several pumps and skimmers, absorbent pads, sweeps and boom. If need be, Melton said, they can deploy more equipment from Anchor-"We have 30,000 feet of boom stored in the Anchorage area, ready to go," Melton said. For this exercise, they flew an inflatable boat from Anchorage, showing the capability to fly a boat to an incident. Once the first wave of responders is on scene and the Incident Command Center set up, a second wave of responders will attack.

One lesson learned had nothing to do with currents and weather, but how to manage logistics of deploying many people to a small community. "We need to figure out where to set up cots for the responders to sleep and rest," Melton said. In a small community like Teller, a large influx of people responding to a spill would stretch the community's capabilities. Plans need to be in place to supply the workers with food, places to rest and sleep after 12 hour shifts. "In a real response, we would bring in 50 to 100 people," Melton said. "And that's just us, not counting the Coast Guard and DEC people.'

In case of the 2004 sinking and resulting oil spill of the Malaysian soy bean carrier Selendang Ayu near Unalaska, Melton said, Chadux had 150 people working for four months. "It depends on what the state and the Coast Guard require in a particular incident, but we roll clean up teams through for as long as it takes," Melton said.

What about storing boom and equipment right there in Teller to save on response time to haul connexes from Nome?

Melton argued that the logic behind equipment storage in hub communities such as Nome is to save on costs. It would be too expensive to store oil response equipment in every village, and those additional costs would be passed on to the consumer, making fuel prices even higher in small communities.

Chadux is an oil spill removal organization, one of several operating in Alaska. It is a non-profit organization that is funded by member companies, who are in the business of transporting fuel, operating fuel storage facilities or also commercial fishery fleets. Those companies need a contingency plan and part of the plan is to be a member of an OSRO. However, Chadux also responds to non-member emergencies. Last year, Chadux was involved in cleaning up spills after the spring flood of Galena. They also responded to the sinking of the fishing vessel Lone Star at the mouth of the Igushik River near Dillingham and of the partial sinking of the fishing tender Fate Hunter near Valdez.

Norton Sound - Kotzebue fish report

By Jim Menard, ADF&G CRAB:

The catch through Saturday morning was 141,500 pounds by 29 permit holders. The storm has slowed the harvest because only a few boats have been able to get out for the last several days and some that did quickly turned back. If the current catch rate continues the GHL will be reached by the third week of August. Crabbers are reminded to record the latitude and longitude and tag number of any tagged crab found in crab pots. Sublegal crab must be returned to the water unharmed. Do not rip the tag off because it will kill the crab.

The R/V Pandalus began the triennial Norton Sound crab survey on July 18, but came scurrying back to port after trawling a couple stations because of weather. The crew plans to go back out on the morning July 20, weather willing.

Chum-No goal established; Pink 25,000; Silver 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal) – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through July 13 were 2,172 kings, 6,660 chums and 139,236 pinks. The crew has been unable to count since the evening of July 13 due to high water. The average historical midpoint for chums at the tower is July 22 and the average third quarter points are July 15 for pinks and July 18 for kings.

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 1,044 kings, 38,000 chums, 1.16 million pinks, 150 silvers, and 185 reds. Counts for kings and pinks by this subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 1,600 kings, 61,000 chums, and 62,000 pinks. Counts for all species by this date were the highest in the 4-year project history, except for kings which were second highest. Unfortunately it looks like the end of the counting season because of high water. The crew left for Koyuk because of high water and when they returned to the camp, or where camp had been located, the camp was gone and presumably taken downstream. Once water levels drop a new site for the project may be located.

SALMON:

Norton Sound

The department opened the commercial salmon fishery in Subdistricts 2 – 6 until 6 p.m. Thursday, July 24. The buyer is setting up commercial salmon fishing periods based on weather and available capacity.

Permit holders are limited to 100 fathoms of gillnet and 6 inches or less mesh size and are reminded to stay in close contact with the buyer to make sure there is a market for their fish.

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon catches this season are: 250 kings, 68,000 chums, 150,000 pinks, 230 reds and 260 silvers by 80 permit holders.

All counting towers have been knocked out by high water, except for Kwiniuk River. All weirs are standing strong and counting continues.

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited and the use of bait is banned until August 15 or subsequent emergency order in the Unalakleet River drainage. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence salmon gillnet fishing, with nets restricted to 6 inches or less mesh size, is open in the marine waters and in the Unalakleet River drainage, below the Chiroskey River and in all other fresh waters. Beach seining is open in all fresh waters 7 days a week. All king salmon captured in beach seines must be immediately released in the water unharmed.

date are the highest in the 5-year project history, and chums are in the middle. The average historical midpoints for chums and pinks are July 16, and for kings the third quarter point is July 18, however there has been no king passage the last three days.

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited and the use of bait is banned until August 15 or subsequent emergency order in the Shaktoolik River drainage. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence salmon gillnet fishing, with nets restricted to 6 inches or less mesh size, is open in the marine waters and all fresh waters 7 days a week. Beach seining is open in all fresh waters 7 days a week. All king salmon captured in beach seines must be immediately released in the water unbarroad.

Cumulative counts through July 13 were 2,000 kings, 38,000 chums and 395,000 pinks. The crew has been unable to count since July 13 due to high water. When the crew cannot count from the tower the sonar counts are then used, but on July 14 the sonar tumbled into the deepest part of the channel and cannot be retrieved until water levels drop.

Nome Subdistrict

For the fifth consecutive year the Nome Subdistrict escapement goal range of 23,000-35,000 chum salmon has been exceeded.

The subsistence set gillnet fishing schedule in the marine waters west of Cape Nome is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Saturday. The marine waters east of Cape Nome are open seven days a week. The fresh water subsistence area set gillnet schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Beach seining is allowed at the same time gillnetting is allowed in both the marine waters and fresh water subsistence areas through July 25. Effective July 26 beach seining will no longer be allowed.

All pink salmon subsistence catch limits throughout the Nome Subdistrict are waived, and except for the Solomon, Penny and Cripple rivers all chum salmon subsistence catch limits are waived throughout Nome Subdistrict. The Penny and Cripple rivers are closed to all fishing for chum salmon by regulation. The subsistence chum salmon catch limit in Solomon River is 40 fish. Check the back of the Nome Subdistrict subsistence salmon permit for the subsistence areas where set gillnetting and beach seining (until July 26) is allowed. There are no subsistence salmon catch limits in the marine Commercial salmon fishing has been on a weather hold. If weather improves then commercial salmon fishing periods will occur.

Eldorado River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 6,000 - 9,200 - cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 15 kings, 22,000 chums and 35,000 pinks. The chum salmon escapement is double the 5-year and 10-year averages by this date and for the fifth consecutive year the chum salmon escapement goal range has been exceeded

Nome River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 2,900 – 4,300; Pink 13,000 – Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 3,175 chums, 28,000 pinks and 13 reds. The average historical midpoint at the weir is July 18 for pinks and July 23 for chums. The chum salmon escapement is triple the 5-year average and double the 10-year average by this date and for the last four out of five years the chum salmon escapement goal range has been met or exceeded.

Snake River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 1,600 – 2,500 – A cooperative project between Fish & Game and NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 2,300 chums and 6,000 pinks. The average historical midpoint at the weir is July 20 for pinks and July 21 for chums. The chum salmon escapement is double the 5-year and 10-year averages by this date and for the last four out of five years the chum salmon escapement goal range has been met or

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 697 chums and 7,700 pinks. Last year by this date the count was 456 chums with a final count of 1,377 chums.

Glacial Lake Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey): Red 800 – 1,600 – A cooperative project between and Fish & Game and NSEDC.

A video system is being used exclusively this year and cumulative counts through midday July 8 were 3,223 reds, 1 beaver and 1 otter. This is the best red salmon count by this date since 2005. The Glacial Lake counts usually drop off about one week earlier than the Pilgrim River counts. The video has been retrieved with counts through July 15, so with Pilgrim River counts in a free fall since July 14 the video would likely show Glacial Lake counts dropping off too.

Port Clarence District

The Pilgrim River and Lower Kuzitrin River is closed to all net fishing. No nets or seines can be put into the Pilgrim River or its tributaries or the Lower Kuzitrin River from 300 yards upstream of the confluence with the Pilgrim River to the mouth of Kuzitrin River.

Pilgrim River Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake & Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake): Red 4,000 – 8,000 – Cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through July 18 were 36 kings, 4,600 chums, 2,450 pinks, and 3,475 reds. The count on July 14 (when net fishing closed) was 601 reds through the weir. The next 4 days have had counts of less than 100 reds a day with total for those 4 days of 227 reds.

At this time the Pilgrim River would not be expected to reopen to net fishing until the second week of August when historically over 95 percent of the red salmon run has passed through the weir. There have been 234 Pilgrim River subsistence salmon permits issued this season; the third highest number in the 51 years permits have been required.

Kotzebue

The commercial fishery has taken off with 66 permit holders already participating surpassing the 65 permits that fished all of last year. The price has now hit 78 cents a pound for chum salmon. If that price were to hold throughout the season it would be the second highest price on record without adjusting for inflation. The highest price was 1988 when it averaged 85 cents a pound.

Cumulative catch was 75,830 chum salmon by 66 permit holders. The catch and effort are well above average and the CPUE is average.

Kobuk River Test Fish - Fish & Game project.

The crew got off to a fast start both on the water and catching fish on July 17. Extremely high water is causing some difficulties, but the test fish cumulative catch of 128 chums ranks sixth best in 22 years.

Sound Off

Why I am Voting "Yes" to Repeal S.B. 21 By Bill Walker

When throughput began to decline in 1988, I joined efforts to put more oil into TAPS. I have been to D.C. numerous times working to get ANWR open for exploration. I joined Governor Hickel and others in an epic battle to ensure Phillips Petroleum (now ConocoPhillips) could purchase ARCO, rather than BP, so Alaska could have more, not fewer oil companies. By opening the door for ConocoPhillips to come back to Alaska as a third major operator, Alaskans are better off today having them on the North Slope.

When issues arise with the oil companies, I always take the side that is best for Alaskans. This brings us to the massive oil tax reforms in SB21. Had I drafted SB21, it would have been a balanced piece of legislation with better incentives to bring more oil companies to Alaska, resulting in new oil into TAPS. Should Vote No prevail in the primary, as governor, I will follow the wishes of the voters on Proposition 1. However, given my 30 years of working in and around oil and gas issues here in Alaska, I felt it appropriate to explain why I am voting yes on Proposition 1.

First, taxes don't increase recovery from existing fields, geology and technology do. Production will decline no matter the tax structure. For example, although Kuparuk Field paid almost no production taxes through much of its history, decline continued. In order to stem decline, new fields and reservoirs need to be brought on line.

In 2010, Shell Alaska's vice president showed me their Alaska leases, which were all federal offshore (OCS). They are offshore he explained, not due to ACES, but because they hunt elephant fields. While new elephant opportunities are offshore, there is plenty of oil on state lands and Alaska needs the next wave of independents content with smaller finds. His point was that majors like Shell, BP and Exxon are high cost operators not interested in the smaller onshore prospects. Smaller operators can leverage a lower cost structure to take on smaller projects. They hunt deer, not elephants.

Yet while oil decline in Alaska has continued, production has taken off in the Lower-48. That L 48 success is due to technology breakthroughs applied to shale plays and the activity of scores of smaller producers, not tax breaks on conventional legacy fields. Alaska should target tax and regulatory changes that will lead to that same success.

If Alaska is to experience dynamic oil production growth it will likely be in one of four areas. First is large offshore pools recently targeted by Shell in the Beaufort and Chukchi Seas. Since taxes are not paid to Alaska from offshore development, it is not a matter of tax policy. Second, is the exploration of new onshore fields. BP and Exxon will not explore outside of existing fields so tax reductions for them will yield no further exploration. Rather than hoping the larger companies explore for smaller pockets of oil, we want an attractive climate for smaller producers. The third area we should incent is the shale plays largely south of Prudhoe. It is not known yet whether they are economic, but the efforts of this large potential resource should be aggressively aided. Fourth, is heavy and viscous oil in the legacy fields (larger fields like Prudhoe and Kuparuk). These are massive in ground deposits that co-exist with the conventional pools already under development.

SB21 should have tied tax reductions to direct investment in those areas. Instead it awards reductions for continued production of already producing fields while eliminating the ACES investment credits. While ACES rewarded spending in Alaska, SB21 rewards existing production, even for oil that will be produced under any tax structure. The result will be more rapid production of the legacy fields, not more oil over time.

And Alaska was already competitive in the legacy fields. If royalty payments to the State as the landowner are added to taxes, SB21 yields less revenue than typically paid in the lower-48 or internationally. With the Administration's help, Senator Stedman (R) compared the North Dakota take from royalty to the landowner and their state taxes to Alaska's system. Alaska would have received $1.4 billion more this year under the North Dakota regime. A 2012 analysis to the Alaska Legislature showed ConocoPhillips's net income in Alaska on a per barrel of oil equivalent basis was approximately 4 time more profitable in Alaska than their L48 production.

However, ACES does need adjustment. The progressivity rate is too high and investment credits are not adequately focused on yielding large oil production increases. With minor adjustments the balance between revenue to the state and effective incentives can be achieved. Of concern to me is that under SB21 the producers can take all of their tax savings out of Alaska because the tax concessions were not tied to any reinvestment in Encouraging production solely through tax incentives is also failed policy. Instead tax breaks should coincide with other steps to encourage new investment and entrants. Wells can be drilled on Mental Health Trust lands in a fraction of the time and cost it takes for other State managed lands. Cutting the time and cost of permitting will significantly enable development. The State should also ensure new producers can access existing North Slope pipelines/facilities at a reasonable cost, and build roads to new developments to help make exploration affordable.

My concern is that SB21 will result in depleting existing fields faster but will do nothing to open new fields for the long term interests of Alaska. There are many dials that can be adjusted to put more oil into TAPS. If SB21 is repealed, under my leadership I will work with all parties to bring forth legislation that incentivizes new exploration to bring long term production of new oil into TAPS.

Dear Editor:

It was a disappointment to only see Democrat legislators at the July 15th Legislative Briefing on Inmate Facilities in Alaska's Correctional Facilities. Chaired by Senator French, other attendees were Senator Gardner, Representatives Josephson and Tarr. Representative Tuck, another Democrat, was patched in by teleconference.

This hearing was to gather information about the rash of deaths of inmates while under state care. People invited to speak were the top officials from the Dept. of Corrections and the AK Mental Health Trust Authority, head of the Correctional Officers Union, and some affected family members.

Why were Republican legislators not in attendance? Had they been there, they would have witnessed the cynicism that emanated from the Parnell administration officials as they repeated their standard line of these deaths being just business as usual. They would have heard the powerful testimony of family members whose loved ones died in our jails under questionable and preventable circumstances..

Legislators don't just pass laws and fund government programs. They're also to hold administration officials accountable for the way public dollars and programs are mis-

The DOC currently is the largest mental health provider in Alaska with 65% of the inmate population having some form of mental illness. Like any disease, mental illnesses can be treated — and without help, it gets worse.

Since the Reagan Era, psychiatric institutions have closed resulting in the criminalization of mental illness, as people left untreated end up in jail without proper care.

The correctional officers union sounded the alarm years ago and asked for help from Parnell administration officials and legislators, to no avail.

Why did Republican legislators not take part in the briefing, look Parnell administration officials in the eye and ask them about deaths that occurred under their watch?

Dear Nome Nugget,

I visited during the Midnight Sun celebration a couple of years ago. I enjoyed seeing and being close to (while in an auto) the musk oxen. However, given the current situation I would suggest trying the same thing that we use on black bears down here in upstate New York (far from New York City). Game managers use rubber buckshot and slugs to encourage the bears to move out of and stay out of areas that are populated and frequented by people. It does no real damage and the sting and noise puts the fear of humans back into animals that have lost it. Sincerely,

Larry M. Litwin Scotia, NY 12302

The state has not done an audit on the oil companies since 2007. The governor does not want to have the state do an audit because it would expose the fact that the billions of free dollars he is giving away is all going out of state. None of it will be spent in Alaska. The money the oil companies are spending now in the oil fields was planned a number of years ago and has nothing to do with the free give away of the state's bilnor is doing the smoke and mirrors thing, the empty hoop dance on this and so far it is working. The governor will be richly rewarded by the oil companies after he is out of office with a cushy high paid job. So he will be personally out on top with this while we will be stuck for years paying income and sales taxes to lions of dollars to them. The gover-

the oil companies after he is out of office, who will be Captain Zero

If 100,000 barrels of oil was increased through the pipeline of which projections say that is not going to happen, it would take to the year 2040 before the state would break even. By then the oil fields will be playing out. The oil compastate should take that money and develop the oil fields that the oil companies are not developing like Norway does. That way the state would get all of the money and the billions of free dollars would then in fact be used for developing the oil fields.

Fairbanks' Lanford wins third annual Cape Nome Marathon

By Keith Conger

With a full 26.2-mile marathon, a half marathon, and a marathon distance bike race, participants had plenty of ways to be challenged at the 3rd Annual Cape Nome Marathon Saturday.

The lone full marathoner was Jane Lanford from Fairbanks. She battled the wind, and handled the muddy conditions in a time of 4 hours, 13 minutes, 39 seconds. A veteran of over 76 marathons, she stated, "it was fun to be out there, but that wind was really hard.

Lanford, 59, began doing marathons in 1981 and is working to complete all the longer distance races Alaska has to offer. Her next marathon will be in Sitka.

Twelve people participated in the 13.1-mile half marathon. Nome's Oliver Hoogendorn, an upcoming co-captain of the Nome-Beltz High School cross-country running team, posted the fastest time at 1 hour, 43 minutes, 48 seconds.

Not only did Hoogendorn take first place overall, but also he posted the fastest time for an under 18 male. Hoogendorn was followed closely in time by Californian Joey Fonseca who came in at 1 hour 44 minutes, 18 seconds.

Recent Nome-Beltz grad Rosa Schmidt, who will be competing for Northwest Christian University in August, was the third runner overall, the first female to cross the line, and the first female under 18 to finish.

Schmidt set a female, half marathon course record with her effort. Her time would have won the half marathon the previous year.

Schmidt, said that her college coaches' running instructions are to do a long run each Saturday, so this race fit in nicely. "I've done 52 miles this week, and I'm just building by about five miles each week."

Three people competed in the 26.2-mile bike race. Nome's Dora Hughes was the first to pedal across the line with a time of 2 hours, 34 minutes, 38 seconds.

Aaron Rose, 14, who plans on cross-country running for Mount Edgecumbe next fall, was the second male in the half marathon under-18 age division with a time of 2 hours 12 minutes, 27 seconds. He has run the race three years in a row.

Rayne Lie and Rena Sparks were the second and third under-18 females to cross the finish line in the half marathon, with times of 3 hours, 7 minutes, 40 seconds, and 3 hours, 10 minutes, 48 seconds respectively.

10 minutes, 48 seconds respectively. Mallory Conger, 12, won the under-18 division in the bike race with a time of 3 hours 14 minutes, 13 seconds.

The Cape Nome Marathon is organized by Crystal Tobuk, who graduated from Nome-Beltz High School in 2000. She has run the race the past two years, but has found that it is too hard to be both a race official and a participant.

"It's my guess that this is the western-most marathon in the United States," said Tobuk.

Knowing that it is very expensive for people from Nome to travel and compete, Tobuk organized this race in 2012. "This was the first marathon that I competed in," said Tobuk. "I felt like if I can complete a full marathon, I can do anything."

Tobuk competed in her first Ultra-Marathon, the 50-mile Resurrection Pass Ultra, last fall.

The full Cape Marathon, as well at the marathon bike race, started at 10:40 at East End Park and ran to a turn around just past Cape Nome. The half marathon participants were trucked out to the cape, and ran back against the wind.

According to race official Jeff Collins, the weather was a factor in the race. He said, "Weather Underground posted a 17 mph reading at race time." He said that the winds picked up for the half marathon. "I think that by feel, it was more like 20 mph, gusting to 25."

Nome's Tahbone, Unalakleet's Hanson post new records at WEIO

Several Nome and Norton Sound athletes participating in the 2014 World Eskimo Indian Olympics came home laden with gold, silver and bronze medals and the fine distinction of having set new world records. Norton Sound received 19 medals: 6 Gold, 7 Silver, 5 Bronze, the Sportsmanship award and set two new World Records.

Nome's Marjorie Tahbone set a new fish cutting world record in 30.58 seconds, besting Unalakleet's Willa Eckenweiler's record of 33.59 seconds set in 2007.

Unalakleet's Nick Hanson set a new world record in the Scissors Broad Jump, jumping 36 feet and 7 inches. In 1993, Jesse Frankson set the record at 36 feet 6 ¾ inches. The record was almost tied in 2005 at NYO by Alan Velasco by jumping 36 feet 6 ¼ inches. That record was tied by Nick Hanson at NYO in 2006. Hanson set the new record and commented, "Setting a new world record and receiving a gold medal is just a bonus. Achieving my personal best means the most to me."

Hanson also received the Sportsmanship Award. Nicole Johnston and Sam Strange gave out the award and were very proud that 10 athletes were nominated by their peers. They said, this reflects on the kindness, quality and positive personalities of the current generation of athletes. The recipient Nick Hanson won by only one vote.

Chanda Simon of Fairbanks was crowned Miss WEIO, with first runner up being Naomi Ahsoak of Barrow, third was Christina Clark of Copper Center.

The communities of Stebbins and St.Michael held their first Wellness Walk, on Saturday July 12.

The invocation was said by Deacon Francis Pete, Sr.

Speakers included Bernie Joe, Lucy Washington, Marian Mike, Alberta Steve, Ward Walker, Peter Kobuk, Leonard and Mary Raymond, Jessica Acoman, Joseph Steve, Jolene Lyon, Damian Tom and Morris Nashoanak, Sr. They talked about strengthening self esteem, pride, self respect and being aware of the signs of depression, guilt and self pity.

City of Stebbins organized the walk and asked both communities of Stebbins and St. Michael to address some of the key concerns by the communities. The Walk was designed to meet half way between the two communities, but due to road construction a mile from Stebbins, the participants walked to the bluff north of Stebbins. One hundred and twenty-four people signed in for the 'Wellness Walk.

"Circle of Life" was the theme of the walk. The theme was inspired by old Yupik-Inupiaq artifacts that depict two circles within one bigger circle with a red dot in the middle. The red dot symbolizes a baby or the beginning of new life.

The organizers asked every person to write down the name of a loved one lost to suicide and to place it in a collection bin. Once the circle was completed and the names placed in the bin, the names were collected and burned.

After the ceremony, there was Eskimo dancing and a potluck with reindeer stew, hotdogs and Subway sandwiches donated by Kawerak Inc. Wellness. The St. Michael IRA council supplied the reindeer. Hotdogs and other support ingredients were donated from the City of Steb-

TELLS OF TOOL-MAKING—Gunter Spreth of Hamburg, Germany explains how northern peoples made tools for survival.

Scholar showcases Inuit tool making

By Sandra L. Medearis

Gunter Spreth, anthropologist and professor from Hamburg, Germany, for years has studied the ways of northern peoples. He has been fascinated by how the Inuit and Eskimos invented tools necessary for survival.

The Inuit and Eskimos, thousands of years ago, looked at bones and stones and saw tools: tools for hunting and fishing, tools for changing available resources into food and clothing.

During his annual summer study trip to Nome, Spreth shared his knowledge in several sessions at Carrie M. McLain Museum, demonstrating his findings to adult and children's groups.

Spreth's program of study was Innovative Inventions of the Inuit, one of the topics he has followed in northern studies for the past 45 years

At the sessions on June 19, Spreth paid homage to clever and innovating tool making, pulling tools out his collection of 400-year-old tools, and passing them around for hands-on appreciation. Spreth showed how the innovative implements fit the function needed by hunter-gatherers.

His own three-year apprenticeship under a skilled craftsman before university gave him the key to understanding ancient tool making, Spreth said.

His mentor craftsmen hated to describe what they were doing.

"They had pictures in their minds. They could see what they were to do.

They were similar to Inuit Eskimos—they thought in pictures, not in words," Spreth said. "A craftsman can understand things in many dimensions.

"The Inuit and Eskimo way of thinking allowed them to optimize a tool," he said. "We can learn. Words for communication are not enough. We can learn from the Inuit way of thinking. Spreth passed around a skin scraper of bone and flint. The creator of the tool had fashioned one side to fit the user's thumb and first two fingers to push the tool against an animal hide to clean and soften it for clothing or footwear. The other side of the tool had grooves to fit the middle and little finger for a firm grasp on the scraper.

The tool fit smaller hands.

"The men made them and the women used them," Spreth said, smiling.

The skin scraper tool like the example shown in Nome had drawn the interests of many museums and anthropologists, according to Spreth.

"It would be a prize winner among tools, This skin scraper is one of the best examples of anthropomorphic tools, tools to fit the hands of the users," he said.

Inuit beliefs and regard for animals also helped guide tool innovation. They wanted them to die quickly to save it from pain.

He has noted many examples in which northern peoples used specific animals for specific tools, Spreth told his audience of Alaska Natives and newcomers.

Spreth cited work by anthropologist Edward William Nelson. He found that Eskimos used fibers from whale ribs to scoop ice chips from fishing holes illustrating that hunters and gatherers were innovative craftsmen.

They looked at plants and saw tools.

Poison for whales

Eskimos hollowed out holes in harpoons and spearheads where they would deposit a fast-acting poison made from roots of the monk's hood flower. Sometimes they smeared it on blades.

"After about three minutes, the whales fins and fluke would be paralyzed and it would drown quickly," Spreth told the 25 or so people gathered around the table at the museum. "One of the rules, the old rules, was to shorten their pain when you catch them." Spreth added that hence came the practice of clubbing fish to finish them quickly.

His travels over the Seward Peninsula, Spreth included Teller, where he saw a dog with a blackish-brownish bone.

Picking up the bone, Spreth realized it was part of a woodworking mallet. It turned out to be the under jaw of a walrus. The toolmaker had cut only enough away to make a handle.

Next, Spreth displayed a rib bone that had been made to catch fish. Split into a wishbone shape, each end had hooks that could move together in a pincer action when the user raised it or the fish attempted to escape.

"These are examples of how certain bones make specific tools," Spreth explained.

The Inuit also took tools that already in use and improved them. An example is the pump drill used for hole making and to start fire, often with driftwood.

"My father used to make us pump drills for toys on King Island, to make us think," Vince Pikonganna shared with the gathering.

"The people of the Arctic were able to create an array of tools using available materials. What kind of technical thinking both long ago and today? Everywhere I look I see genius," Spreth said.

Treadwell's tax would crush homebuyers

Treadwell would eliminate provision 30 million American families

U.S. Senate candidate Mead Treadwell is plugging a tax scheme that would crush homebuyers in Alaska, eliminating a provision over 30 million Americans rely on each year. Treadwell's plan would force Alaskans and Americans to pay thousands of dollars more when buying a house.

Treadwell's extreme tax scheme would eliminate the home mortgage interest deduction. The provision has been commonplace for American families hoping to buy homes and its elimination would shift the tax burden from wealthier Americans to lower-income households, strangling the finances of working Alaska fam-

"Mead Treadwell's tax scheme would not only raises taxes on everyday goods for Alaska households, but eliminate a provision advancing the American dream of owning a home for thousands of working families in Alaska," said Max Croes, Communications Director for Alaskans for Begich.

Treadwell's 30 percent national sales tax would further complicate homeownership for Alaskans', as the tax would include mortgage interest.

Republicans, Democrats, and tax experts alike have criticized the scheme. Former President George W. Bush's administration rejected the proposal and said it would create "the largest entitlement program in because of the extreme poverty it would create among lower income Americans.

How much would Treadwell's sales tax cost Alaskans?

Treadwell supports 30 percent National Sales Tax, elimination of home mortgage deduction

At the GOP debate in Homer,

Mead Treadwell strongly endorsed establishment of a 30 percent National Sales Tax. Treadwell joined Joe Miller in support of this tax, which would drive up the cost of basic consumer goods while eliminating the home mortgage deduction. The cost of living in Alaska already is 131 percent of the national average, and Treadwell's sales tax would make it even harder to afford living in Alaska.

"Mead Treadwell is completely out of touch with working families if he's proposing a 30 percent National Sales Tax," said Mike Wenstrup, Chairman of the Alaska Democratic Party.

How Much Would Alaskans Pav For Mead Treadwell's National Sales Tax?

· A $12 gallon of milk in rural

Alaska would cost $16 with Treadwell's tax.

· A $50 tank of gas would cost $65 with Treadwell's tax.

· A new $25,000 pickup would cost $32,5200 with Treadwell's tax. A new $10,000 snowmachine would cost $13,000 with Treadwell's

Red Dog Mine celebrates 25 years

On Monday, the Red Dog Mine in Northwest Alaska held a celebration for mine employees in honor of its 25th anniversary. The mine is one of the largest zinc producers in the world and is often cited as a positive example of indigenous people and mining companies working together. Alaska Native Corporation, NANA Regional Corporation, Inc., owns the land on which the mine is situated and Teck Alaska, a subsidiary of Teck Resources Limited (Teck), is the operator.

The celebration was attended by a number of special guests, many of whom worked to make the mine a reality, including: former Governor Bill Sheffield, NANA Regional Corp. Chair Donald G. Sheldon, Teck President and CEO Don Lindsay, former NANA President Willie Hensley and past Chair Christina Westlake.

Since 1989, Red Dog Mine has provided more than $199 million in dividends to NANA shareholders and $608 million of its $1 billion mine proceeds to all Alaska Natives through the 7(i) "sharing" provisions of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, or ANCSA [ANK-SA]. The provision requires that Alaska Native Corporations (ANCs) share approximately 60 percent of revenues from developed ANCSA lands with other ANCs.

Red Dog Mine is an economic engine for Northwest Alaska, the state and the nation, paying approximately $119 million as payment in lieu of taxes (PILT) to the Northwest Arctic Borough, providing 70 percent of U.S. zinc production and injecting more than $1.5 billion into the Alaska economy. In 2013, more than 586 NANA shareholders worked at the mine for Teck and NANA companies operating at the mine, earning $29.4 million and making up 54 percent of mine employees.

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev.Ross Tozzi, Pastor St. Joseph Catholic Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association Love Your Enemy

A natural response to violence, is to strike back. The idea of "An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth" fits our sense of justice. As those in war zones painfully know, when we strike back there is often collateral damage and the truly innocent may suffer worse than those we intended to retaliate against.

The Old Testament commandment of an eye for an eye was meant to moderate vengeance; the punishment should not exceed the injury done. Jesus forbids even this proportionate retaliation. Jesus recognized that violence escalates and that even proportionate responses are unjust because they perpetuate the cycle of violence. Instead, Jesus teaches us to turn the other cheek, to respond to evil with good, and to love our enemies.

When Jesus was crucified on the cross, he showed us one way we can respond to evil. His next to last words were, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." Is this humanly possible? Could you turn the other cheek to someone who had shown no mercy to you?

Marc Berkowitz was just a little boy when he and his family were taken to a concentration camp under the jurisdiction of Joseph Mengele. Marc saw Mengele send his mother to the gas chamber. A couple of days later, Mengele asked the young boy, if he still believed in God. Marc knew that if he were to hate, it would be his undoing. Instead, he told Mengele. "Everything has been taken from me now. But God you will never take because he instilled this feeling in me, and only he can take it away."

Years later, Marc speculated how he would repay Mengele if he had the chance. "I don't want to see him suffer. Justice to me would be for him to spend time with me. I will be his servant again, very courteous. At the end of two years with me, he will say, 'Yes, we can teach our children not to hate.' Marc had no doubts he could redeem this evil man by loving his enemy.

Arctic, residents of the region are anxious to learn what measures are taken to prevent an oil spill or mitigate one if a spill or vessel accident were to occur. The Alaska Nanuuq Commission and the Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition are active in providing input in the US Coast Guard's Port Access Route Study and also work with federal legislators to provide marine mapping for possible alternative shipping routes in hopes of lessening impacts to communities and subsistence resources, said Jack Omelak.

The urgent interest in the health and integrity of the marine environment for Bering Strait region residents was a lesson learned for industry observer Captain Dan Nutt, director for regulatory affairs with Kirby Offshore Marine. Nutt said in an interview with the Nome Nugget he felt the drill was a success. "I have a better appreciation for the stakeholders and for the folks who live in the area," he said. "I understand that the industry can do a better job on reaching out and letting them know what is going on."

Nutt said that although stringent prevention and spill plans are in place and are up for review every five years, it is not enough to put a legal ad in the paper to announce the public review process. "We don't have to wait for a plan review to visit the communities and explain what we do," said Nutt.

This drill mostly dealt with tug and barge companies that transport fuel up and down the coast of western Alaska. Cheryl Fultz, environmental compliance specialist with Delta Western said that tug and barge companies have not had an increase in vessel traffic through the Bering Strait in the past few years. She said in an email correspondence with the Nugget that this drill was more or less an experiment. "Every year our vessels are inspected and subject to drills by ADEC," she wrote. "These are both the planned and unannounced kind. This year all the plan holders within the vessel program of ADEC were asked to participate in the Port Clarence drill in lieu of being drilled on our own. My impression of the drill is that it is a first step." She learned the most from Wesley Okbaok.

"It's simple to put boom in the water. The tricky part is to get boom in the right place in a quick and efficient manner."

"When you meet a gentleman like Wesley, you realize all of the talent available in this region. This community lives off of the sea, and to that end they know every nuance of how the waters behave."

Okbaok described the way tide comes in at Port Clarence, how the tides are very minute and that the wind plays more of a role than the tide itself. "This type of local knowledge can be utilized during a spill," said Fultz.

After the drill, Melton said, the biggest lesson learned was the reality of seeing the channel between Teller and Brevig Mission.

The terrific force of the current forced a change on how to deploy boom and at what angle.

DEC's Kotula agreed. "The response strategy for that area is going to require some adjustment," Kotula said.

"It's safe to say there is a better way to position the boom."
Vitus Marine Safety & Environ mental Manager Kevin O'Shea echoed

the lesson learned.

"There were several items that were being tested during this exercise, the first was the ability to move spill response equipment located in Nome, to Teller. This was performed successfully," O'Shea wrote in an email to the Nugget.

"The second item was to test the Geographical Response Strategy for the Grantley Harbor Entrance as described in the Regional Response Plan.We learned that the GRS for this location needs to be modified based on the actual conditions that were experienced in Teller."

The collective feeling after the drill was positive. Kotula said the information gained from the drill was substantial. "We have pages and pages of notes and documents to go through," Kotula said. "It was a welldone exercise that will help us to improve the contingency plans."

Those who look out for protection of subsistence users also had good words to say. Jack Omelak said in an email to the Nugget, "From the Alaska Nanuuq Commission and Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition's perspective, the drill was a success as it illustrated the commitment of the agencies involved to at least begin to develop an oil spill/ hazard response process within our region."

Gay Sheffield echoed the sentiment. "Everybody learned something new about the logistics of spill response in the Grantley Harbor area, both the people who live here and those spill responders who will come in from afar," she said. "I am very glad the visiting responders said this was the first step. To be best prepared, we all need to work as a team to become more informed about our collective strength and the options we have to mitigate and respond to maritime crises."

Omelak added modification of the drill due to rough weather was initially cause for concern.

"But in order to provide solutions it is best to understand what the challenges are, or may be, and I think this limited exercise was the beginning of identifying the challenges to responding in western Alaska," he said.

"From the perspective of those we represent, we were excited to be a part of this initial drill and hope to be included in subsequent and more broad efforts as development, oil spill, and mitigation directly affects the marine mammal users that we represent."

"We hope to be able to help develop as federal marine co-managers, with agencies such as Chadux in the near future, a contact list or protocols for local and immediate responders as many agencies and locals face the same immediate questions: who do we call or contact? How should it be done, and with what equipment?" Omelak suggested.

Realizing that this drill is a small piece of the puzzle to develop adequate oil spill and disaster policies in this region, Omelak made the case for cooperation between area residents and spill experts.

"It is evident that a network of local users with local knowledge, combined with technical knowledge about oil spills, and outreach campaigns for communities is needed," Omelak wrote.

"Of course mitigation is important, but more importantly is the prevention of oil spills or disasters."

Recognizing the gap of knowledge in the communities of what is required of tug and barge transporters and local oil storage facilities, Chadux management as well as DEC's marine vessel manager John Kotula and industry representatives such as Kevin O'Shea and Captain Dan Nutt agreed that it would be a good idea to travel to Nome and maybe Teller and Brevig Mission to hold townhall meetings to inform the communities about oil spill prevention and response and what goes into

Common Council rejects taxing miners and tourists

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Common Council tossed out a measure headed to the October ballot asking voters to approve a summer season sales tax increase from five percent to six

It would be more trouble than benefit to the budget, the Council

Councilmember Jerald Brown tried to amend the resolution to lower the tax by one percent during winter months to balance the onepercent summer increase, but that amendment did not fly, nor did the main motion to put the summer tax hike on the municipal ballot.

City Clerk Tom Moran said the varied tax rate would be hard to administer at the tax desk. He couldn't quantify the costs for the accounting burden, but "we'd have to know which people were continuing the lower winter tax at four percent too long or the six percent summer tax longer than necessary," Moran said. "I think we're opening another can of worms," Councilmember

Randy Pomeranz said. Councilmember Stan Andersen agreed, wondering what would happen when the number of miners and visitors decreased and the City would have to ask the voters to get rid of the tax. "I'd rather see us cut the budget than start taxing," he said.

Councilman Matt Culley thought it was "hysterical," for the Council to be considering a change in both the tax rate and the mill rate.

The Council voted down the whole up-and-down tax scheme.

Miners complain

In other business, the Council heard from gold miners during public comment for almost an hour straight, as each person came to the podium to register annoyance or more at a letter City Manager Josie Bahnke sent to Commissioner Joe Balash of state Dept. of Natural Re-

The letter asked for help from the state for staffing and costs incurred to host gold miners using offshore leases sold by the state in 2011.

The letter asked for stiffer penalties and emphasized the social costs from gold miners flocking to Nome. Bahnke apologized.

She did not intentionally cast miners in a bad light, she said. However, in emphasizing the burden of the summer visitors, the letter to DNR Commissioner Joe Balash said, that "to date, there has been some economic benefit from the offshore mining, but the negative social impacts that we are experiencing far outweigh the benefits.'

Hogwash, the miners said.

They were spending big bucks in Nome. What were the negative social impacts they asked? Mayor Denise Michels gave them an exammple.

People were trading gold for heroin, Michels said.

Steiger named acting NVFD fire chief

By Sandra L. Medearis

City Manager Josie Bahnke has relieved Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. Chief Matt Johnson of his duties as the head of the volunteer fire brigade effective July 18, Bahnke confirmed.

Johnson served in the capacity for seven years, succeeding Fire Chief Wes Perkins.

Assistant Fire Chief Jerry Steiger has taken the position of acting fire chief with firefighter Jimmy West Jr. backing him up as assistant chief.

"I have given 14 years of dedicated service to the community of Nome," Johnson said Monday. "All I did was to put in a bid on a job. That's all I'm going to say."

Johnson referred to a controversy over a contract he bid for servicing and repairing the City's emergency and light duty vehicles.

Bahnke declined to comment on the firing Monday, deeming it a "personnel matter."

Steiger said that the NVFD officers-Steiger, West, Battalion Chief Chuck Fagerstrom, captains and lieutenants-had been meeting to process candidates to put forward to Bahnke for the chief's job.

The City pays a stipend to the fire chief of $600 per month. Otherwise, the department is an all-volunteer organization.

NVFD was established over 75 years ago.

The department is considering candidate qualifications and carefully evaluating to find candidates to

Musk ox gores and kills yet another sled dog in Nome

By Diana Haecker

A musk ox has gored and killed yet another dog on Saturday, July 26, at the Nome dog lot off Little Creek Road, where several dog mushers keep their sled dog teams.

The dog named Onslo belonged to Mitch Erickson.

Erickson said he fed his four dogs on Friday night around 9:30 p.m. and everything was fine. He kept two dogs in a chain-link dog pen attached to a shelter barn.

The other two dogs were tethered to poles with access to food dishes and doghouses.

Erickson said his son Tucker went to play with the dogs at noon on Saturday. Tucker discovered that something went terribly wrong. "He found the pen trashed, the two dogs that were in the pen running around loose," described Erickson. As soon as Erickson arrived at the scene, he saw the destruction and he realized that one dog, Onslo, who had been tethered to a pole, was missing. Onslo's doghouse was tossed on its side, the chain of the dog was missing and there were musk ox hoof prints and skid marks of hooves in the dog's gravel circle.

About ten yards away, the dog pen, consisting of several connected chain-link panels and a chain-link gate, was bent inward and completely destroyed. It looked like a bulldozer has hit the fence structure and knocked it over. Traces of blood were on the ground and on the fence.

Erickson alerted his longtime kennel partner Diana Adams, who also keeps her dogs at the lot.

Adams alerted several other dog owners including Chrystie Salesky and John Handeland and told them a musk ox attack had occurred and that a dog was missing.

While Erickson went home to get his truck, Handeland arrived from the road that leads to Erickson's dog lot from the west off Center Creek Road. Looking for the missing dog, Diana Adams walked towards Handeland. "She just gave me the 30second version of what happened, when we discovered a huge blood stain on the ground," said Handeland. Adams then started to call Onslo's name and heard a sound coming from a pool at the side of the

Dear Editor:

The community should create a musk ox farm. It seems that the musk ox are seeking refuge there. Debra Samson Bethel, Alaska

Dear Editor.

SB21 has been touted as the More Alaska Production Act. A more accurate description is Minimize Alaska's Profits Act. Historically, instability in the Middle East has driven the price of oil higher. Shouldn't Alaska shareholders benefit from the higher prices too? I'm voting yes on Proposition One, because the majority of our legislators forgot which "Board Room" they were in when they cast their vote.

152 Where Are You?

Recent news proclaims that air carriers are now making profits. Now it is time for Alaska Airlines to restore the third passenger jet. Flight 152, to service Nome and Anchorage. Most folks who have seen the movie Titanic where the passengers were packed shoulder to shoulder into the lower decks where they could sing, dance and party. Alaska Airlines passengers can identify with these conditions, except for the dancing. We do enjoy talking with our friends. On ships it was called steerage, on planes it is called coach. Some of us are old enough to remember when passengers got a meal with real silverware, linen napkins and a hot towel to refresh us. Well, those days are long gone and replaced with warm juice and pretzels. The real inconvenience for Nomeites and our neighbors is the lack of the mid-day third jet. It's been almost a year since Flight 152 has disappeared. The impacts on the flying public are more than major inconveniences. Folks connecting from villages have to spend an extra day in Nome. Folks trying to make an afternoon appointment in Anchorage have to fly into Anchorage a day early and need good luck trying to find a hotel during the tourist season. Folks trying to connect to Seattle and beyond have to plan to sleep at SeaTac till they can make a connection. Both flights out of Nome are booked and overbooked. If a person has an emergency or unplanned need to fly to Anchorage they are facing a scarcity of seats. Of course mail and cargo are also impacted by the lack of flights.

Like many Alaskans, I take a great deal of pride in myself for being able to use common sense to make good decisions. I'm a believer in that if something doesn't make sense, it's probably not the truth. Now don't get me wrong, I'll give just about anyone the benefit of the doubt, but I'll probably also do my homework to verify whether what you told me is actually truthful. Like Ronald Reagan said, "Trust but verify."

In the current oil tax debate, one side is saying that SB21 is just another Big Oil giveaway. The other side is saying that the flaws in ACES resulted in oil production declines. They're promising that SB21 would fix things and put Alaska back on track by boosting oil production thereby creating lucrative jobs that Alaskans need.

I have read media reports, academic papers, editorials, and even the legislation itself over the last few months. Truth be told, I still can't make heads or tails out of it.

As a registered Republican, I agree that cutting taxes is generally a good thing, but SB21 leaves a giant void on my radar and many questions left unanswered. After all, SB21 is supposed to be a flat tax. A flat tax sounds good, it sounds reasonable, and it sounds simple to understand. But anyone willing to dig deeper will soon discover numerous complex tax credits woven into the framework of the bill in such a fashion that they can't help but wonder if it was written by Big Oil itself.

I'm left feeling disappointed by most of this. Because I have so many questions, I am left to draw just one conclusion; I would rather keep what I already have and understand than jump blindly into the unknown because some politicians and Big Oil are promising the grass will be greener on the other side.

August 19th, I'm voting Yes on Prop 1.

Adam R. Lust Nome, AK

ICC declaration calls for better cooperation among Inuit organizations

The Nunatsiaq News reports that the Inuit Circumpolar Council's 12th general assembly took place in Inuvik. It ended on July 24 with a declaration to promote better knowledge sharing between Inuit organizations and the rest of the world.

Inuit leaders from Canada, Greenland, Chukotka and Alaska meet every four years to discuss issues of importance for circumpolar residents. At this year's meeting, they signed and adopted the Kitigaaryuit Declaration, which outlines 51 principles meant to guide the ICC's activities over the next four years.

The declaration urges Inuit regions to develop more communitybased monitoring and to strengthen links with other Inuit organizations to share that knowledge.

The declaration also calls to convene an Inuit economic summit sometime in the next four years to encourage collaboration among Inuit businesses, as well as an Inuit-specific convention on wildlife management and planning.

Outgoing ICC chair Aqqaluk Lynge of Greenland signed off on the declaration. ICC's new chair is Okalik Eegeesiak of Canada.

"We know that the world is looking to our homeland to develop our renewable and non-renewable resources and Inuit must be at the table as discussions and decisions are being made about activities in our own backyard," Eegeesiak said in a July 24 release.

"Inuit will still be in the Arctic when the last barrel of oil and the final piece of ore is extracted from our land.'

Eggesiak assumes the role of chair alongside Duane Smith, returning president of ICC Canada, Jimmy Stotts, president of ICC Alaska, Tatiana Achirgina of ICC Chukotka and incoming president of ICC Greenland, Hialmar Dahl.

The next ICC General Assembly will be hosted in Barrow in 2018.

Court overturns listing of the Beringia population of bearded seals

The U.S. District Court for the District of Alaska last week overturned the National Marine Fisheries Service 2012 listing of the Beringia population of bearded seals as threatened under the Endangered Species Act. The Beringia population of bearded seals can be found within Alaska and U.S. lands and waters.

In order to list a species under the Endangered Species Act, NMFS must show a connection between the scientific data and the decision to list. NMFS admitted that the Beringia population is currently at healthy levels but decided to list the population anyway. Alaska and others sought to overturn the threatened listing on the grounds that the decision lacked the necessary scientific evidence to support the decision.

"The State is committed to the sustainable management of its wildlife, but in this instance there was no demonstrated need to list the seals," Department of Fish and Game Commissioner Cora Campbell said. "We are pleased that the court acted on the admission by NMFS that it lacked any reliable data as to the actual impact on the bearded seal population as a result of the loss of sea-ice out to end of the century. We are also pleased with the Court's finding that in this case forecasting more than 50 years into the future is simply too speculative."

NOAA-led study shows Alaska fisheries and communities at risk from ocean acidification

Ocean acidification is driving changes in waters vital to Alaska's valuable commercial fisheries and subsistence way of life, according to new NOAA-led research that will be published online in Progress in Oceanography.

Many of Alaska's nutritionally and economically valuable marine fisheries are located in waters that are alexperiencing acidification. Communities in southeast and southwest Alaska face the highest risk from ocean acidification because they rely heavily on fisheries that are expected to be most affected by ocean acidification, and have underlying factors that make those communities more vulnerable, such as lower incomes and fewer employment opportunities.

The term "ocean acidification" describes the process of ocean water becoming more acidic as a result of absorbing nearly a third of the carbon dioxide released into the atmosphere from human sources. This change in ocean chemistry is affecting marine life, particularly the ability of shellfish, corals and small creatures in the early stages of the food chain to build skeletons or

Studies show that red king crab and tanner crab, two important Alaskan fisheries, grow more slowly and don't survive as well in more acidic waters. Alaska's coastal waters are particularly vulnerable to ocean acidification because of cold water that can absorb more carbon dioxide, and unique ocean circulation patterns, which bring naturally acidic deep ocean waters to the sur-

"We went beyond the traditional approach of looking at dollars lost or species impacted; we know these fisheries are lifelines for native communities and what we've learned will help them adapt to a changing ocean environment," said Jeremy Mathis, Ph.D., co-lead author of the study, an oceanographer at NOAA's Pacific Marine Environmental Laboratory in Seattle, and the director of the University of Alaska Fairbanks School of Fisheries and Ocean Sciences Ocean Acidification Research Center.

The research presented in the new study examines the potential effects on a state where the fishing industry supports over 100,000 jobs and generates more than $5 billion in annual revenue and helps maintain the U.S. balance of trade in the global economy. Additionally, approximately 120,000 people or roughly 17 percent of Alaskans rely on subsistence fisheries for most, if not all of their dietary protein. Fishery-related tourism also brings in $300 million annually.

'Ocean acidification is not just an ecological problem - it's an economic problem," said Steve Colt, Ph.D., co-author of the study and an economist at the University of Alaska Anchorage. "The people of coastal Alaska, who have always looked to the sea for sustenance and prosperity, will be most affected. But all Alaskans need to understand how and where ocean acidification threatens our marine resources so that we can work together to address the challenges and maintain healthy and productive coastal communities."

The study recommends that residents and stakeholders in vulnerable regions prepare for this environmental challenge and develop response strategies that incorporate community values and needs. "This research allows planners to think creatively about ways to help coastal communities withstand environmental change," said Sarah Cooley, Ph.D., co-lead author who was at the Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution while doing the research and is now science outreach manager at Ocean Conservancy, in Washington, D.C. "Adaptations can be tailored to address specific social and environmental weak points that exist in a community.'

BOEM calls for Information and Nominations for Potential 2017 Oil and Gas Lease Sale

The Bureau of Ocean Energy Management last week issued a Call for Information and Nominations for potential Oil and Gas Lease Sale 242, proposed for the Beaufort Sea Planning Area off Alaska in 2017.

The 45-day call seeks to gather information about specific areas within the Beaufort Sea Planning Area that have the most promising oil and gas resource potential, while also increasing the agency's understanding about environmentally sensitive habitats and important social and cultural uses - including vital Alaska Native subsistence activities – that also exist within the area.

Issuing the Call is an early step in the bureau's approach to leasing offshore Alaska, as established in the Department of the Interior's 2012-2017 Outer Continental Shelf Oil & Gas Leasing Program. The call does not indicate a final decision about any areas that may be offered for lease in the future.

The Call is designed to provide BOEM with information about interest in offshore oil and gas leasing by requesting that industry identify specific blocks in the Beaufort Sea Program Area that appear promising for oil and gas exploration and develop-

BOEM also asks for comments relevant to BOEM's analysis of areas for potential leasing as well as areas that should be considered for exclusion from leasing due to conflicting values, uses or environmental concerns. Interested parties are encouraged to be as specific as possible in explaining why an area should be ex-

Johnson has been involved in a flap over a bid for the contract to repair and maintain the City's emergency vehicles and light duty trucks, altogether numbering 32 vehicles.

Two mechanic shops put in bids, Johnson's Nome Machine Works and Trinity Sails Repair, owned by Rolland Trowbridge.

Bahnke sought approval of the Nome Common Council to award the contract to Trowbridge who bid an hourly rate of $10 less than Johnson and a margin on parts of 25 percent to Johnson's 35 percent.

However, Johnson put in a timely bid protest in compliance with City

In his protest, Johnson took issue with Trowbridge's qualifications and shop premises and his ability to do the work on sophisticated technology in the emergency vehicles, including a $700,000 firefighting vehicle.

Trowbridge produced certificates Bahnke found satisfactory, and put forth his name for the contract award once more.

However, the Council raised issues with Trowbridge performing a vehicle shop business in a General Use Zone. The City's attorney nullified the zoning issue as an impediment to awarding the bid to Trowbridge.

The Council approved a resolution giving him the contract at their July 28 meeting.

NVFD fights small fire

By Diana Haecker

On Monday afternoon, around 3:45 p.m. the Nome Volunteer Fire Department was toned out for a small fire at a shed on First Avenue, next to the old Pharmacy Building. About 16 volunteer firefighters, a fire engine and one fire truck responded. Some smoke escaped from a wooden storage shed behind Mark's Soap'n Suds. NVFD quickly brought the flames under control.

NVFD Acting Fire Chief Jerry Steiger said that the fire started at the eastern outside wall of the shed. "The cause of the fire was from an outside exterior source," Steiger said. "Although the cause of it is not 100 percent determined, it possibly could be from a cigarette butt." Steiger said that in the area where the fire started there were hundreds of cigarette butts littering the ground.

The fire started in the wall cavity of the building. The flames were extinguished with water. Nome Joint Utilities employees also responded and cut a power line connecting the old pharmacy building to a utility pole. The fire caused no damage and no injuries were reported.

Chuck Lagnan Unalablet, Celasta latched onto her arm in pain and panic.

Handeland had to rush to help pry Onslo's jaws open to free Adams.

She later went to the Emergency Room, where she was treated for puncture wounds.

Salesky was there to help look for the dog and when he was found, she started crying over the terrible sight.

Handeland described that the intestines and inner organs spilled out of the dog's abdomen. "It was painfully obvious that the dog could not be saved," Handeland said.

Onslo, age 12, received the coup de grâce there at the spot.

Prior to the dog's discovery, the police dispatch was notified of the apparent musk ox attack. According to Handeland, dispatch said that no NPD officer was available to respond. The dispatch notified the Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game. Management coordinator and wildlife biologist Peter Bente responded to the scene around 2:45 p.m. Another bystander called Alaska Wildlife Trooper Michael Cresswell.

Erickson said he's working off the theory that his dog Black Bird was hiding in his doghouse when a lone musk ox attacked. Erickson theorized that Onslo somehow broke an S-hook on the chain and freed himself from the tether on the pole. "We guess he got loose and ran to the pen, because that's where he usually ran to," Erickson said. "The musk ox probably followed him and pinned him against the pen; that's how he ended up getting gored." Once the pen was destroyed the other two dogs escaped. Onslo, dragging his chain, made for the pond where he was found.

By the time the gruesome discovery was made, the offending musk ox was long gone. Bente said he inspected the area for the culprit, but could not determine which animal caused the damage.

There was a group of 20 musk oxen north of the Monofill and one single musk ox closer to the Nome-Teller highway, Bente said.

"Since then, we moved two groups of musk oxen," Bente said.

One group was moved away from the Monofill and the other group was moved from AC towards the adjacent meadowland. Bente explained that ADF&G biologists move musk oxen by pushing them with, ideally, three people. One pushes the herd from the rear, while two are at the flanks to guide the movement. "We also use cracker shots and rubber bullets," said Bente. But the herders are walking a fine line, because if pushed too fast or too hard, the musk oxen respond by standing their ground and not moving at all.

Mitch Erickson suspects a lone musk ox that has been hanging around AC and the cemetery.

Onslo's death marks the second death of a sled dog this summer that fell victim to a musk ox attack. Gary and Laura Samuelson's dog Bernard was killed in June.

Erickson's dog Black Bird was attacked by a musk ox last year, but survived its neck wounds.

One of Diana Adams' dogs was attacked two years ago at the same spot and did not survive.

What can be done?

"To tell you the truth, don't think there is anything that could be done," said Erickson. "There are so many of them. They run around here. They have no predators here and that's why they are in town."

ADF&G wildlife managers have brought up the theory that musk oxen frequent Nome because of an abundance of food and protection from predators like wolves and bears. In Game Unit 22, game managers estimate a musk ox population of 2,700 animals. Of those, about 100 to 150 animals live in Nome proper.

Bente said that hunting regulations allow for 29 musk oxen being taken with a Tier 2 permit in Game Units 22C, D and B.

For Unit 22C - the area between the Nome and Snake rivers, specifically, ADF&G opened a Tier 2 hunt for five musk oxen bulls. The permits were awarded in February and are available only to hunters certified in using muzzleloader, shotgun or bow and arrow. Those are the only weapons allowed to take musk oxen in that specific hunt.

A registration hunt is open for ten musk oxen for the communities of Shishmaref and Wales.

Peter Bente points to new regulations allowing hunters to harvest one bear each regulatory year in Game Unit 22 C, relaxing the old regulations that only allowed the harvest of one bear per four regulatory years.

Game managers hope that hunters will take advantage of the bear hunt, which begins August 1 to thin out the bear population. This may in turn have the effect that musk oxen don't feel compelled to seek out Nome for protection from predators.

Mitch Erickson said that dog team owners at the dog lot have been running sort of a neighborhood watch and have been notifying each other when musk oxen were observed moving into the area. Then, the dog team owners would drive the musk oxen out of the area, sometimes with oversized vehicles and other methods. "We tried fire crackers, we tried every thing except flame throwers to drive them out," Erickson said. To no avail. The musk oxen keep coming back. And dog owners keep driving them out.

Bente reaffirmed ADF&G's recommendation to keep dogs inside at night.

If that's not practical, owner should check on outside animals frequently. They recommend fencing around dog lots. The game managers have experimented with two inflatable bears placed at Munz Field and bear urine spread around the cemetery. The inflatable bears didn't work. The jury is still out on the effect of bear urine.

John Handeland reflected on the situation. "It's likely we brought it on ourselves," he said. "We asked ADF&G [to restrict hunts] for musk oxen viewing purposes for tourist and now that they've moved into town, we need to recognize the error of our request." Handeland finds it harder and harder to take his dogs for a walk without running into herds of musk oxen here or there. "My fear is that a child with a pet dog unknowingly walks into a bad situation. That would be a sad day for Nome," he

The Nome Kennel Club sent a letter to the City of Nome and requested action to be taken about the nuisance musk oxen. They identified at least five dogs killed and five dogs having sustained injuries from musk ox attacks since 2010.

According to the City manager's office, a work session with Nome Common Council and wildlife managers as well as wildlife troopers has been scheduled for the end of August, but manager Josie Bahnke tried at press time to move the meeting to an earlier date.

Erickson moved his last three dogs to his home in Icy View to keep them protected for now. Erickson said doesn't feel any hatred toward musk oxen.

"But it's tough to loose your buddy like that," he said.

"All the money in the world can't change the fact that SB 21 is a massive giveaway"

By T.J. Presley, Anchorage, AK

A standing room only crowd watched Senator Bill Wielechowski and long-time Alaska economist Gregg Erickson easily win the oil tax debate last night, hosted by Alaska Common Ground at the Wilda Marston Theatre in the Loussac Library.

Senator Wielechowski and Mr. Erickson repeatedly pointed out that under ACES. Alaska saw record oil investment, record numbers of oil jobs and a 383% increase in the number of oil companies doing business in Alaska. And oil company profits skyrocketed, with the industry making over $43 billion in profits, at rates of return of 123% at Prudhoe

Meanwhile, under SB 21, the "More Alaska Production Act", Governor Parnell is now predicting, based on oil company data, that oil production will plummet 45% over the next decade, and revenue will also plunge, putting Alaska on a pathway to poverty.

Largely missing from Keithley and Marks' presentations were facts, as they struggled to rebut any of the Vote Yes points. Wielechowski and Erickson came prepared and made point after point calling out the misrepresentations by the other side.

Chairman of Vote Yes! Repeal the Giveaway, and signer of the Alaska Constitution, Vic Fischer, also attended. "This is exactly the kind of thing we were trying to prevent," says Fischer. "These companies are spending millions upon millions to convince Alaskans that they are getting a fair deal for their resource. But the people are being misled by an expensive, well-oiled ad campaign blasted through every medium pos-

Wielechowski and Erickson focused on Alaska's role as an "owner state", a term coined by the late Governor Wally Hickel. "I think I felt Wally Hickel in the room last night, said Malcolm Roberts who attended the debate. Long-time aide to Governor Hickel, Roberts has seen oil companies get their way in Alaska before. "No one is surprised the industry is fighting for as much profit as possible," he noted "but it's our job, and our Governor's job, to fight for the maximum benefit of the people, for the use of OUR resources. We didn't get that with SB21."

Oil companies continue to pour money into the No on 1 campaign, only increasing the amount Alaskans are hearing about the issue. "I think they're seeing through it," says Fischer. "People are paying attention now. And all they have to do it listen to the facts and it'll be clear on August 19th: Vote Yes! Repeal the Give-

In foreign affairs, not doing anything is the thing to do

By Sheldon Richman

The heartbreaking violence in the Middle East, Ukraine, and elsewhere carries many messages, but here's one Americans shouldn't miss: The United States — no matter who the president is - cannot manage world conflict. The corollary is that when a president tries to manage it, things will usually get worse. Foresight is always defective, and tragic unintended consequences will prevail.

The foreign-policy "experts" in both major political parties, and the intelligentsia generally, think otherwise. No matter who holds power, we can expect the opposition to complain that the chief executive poorly anticipated and thus improperly responded to world events.

If this charge weren't so ominous, it would be comical to hear Republicans berating Barack Obama for failing to be "proactive," for repeatedly being caught by surprise, and for not exerting "American leadership" to keep the world's hot spots under control and, most important, in harmony with "American interests."

But contrary to what Republicans say (or what Democrats would say if a Republican were in power), the fault lies not in the president — at least not this fault — but in the mission itself: anticipating change and managing world conflict. No president can do that competently. Why not? Because the task is not doable, and danger lies in thinking it is. Moreover, the delusion that it is doable almost always makes situations worse than they otherwise would be - weapons proliferate, violence spreads, noncombatant casualties multiply — and all this creates enemies for the American people.

Who thinks that's a good thing? I doubt the American people would if they understood what their so-called leaders - misleaders and misrepresentatives are better terms - are doing to them, not to mention what the "leaders" are doing to the hapless subject populations abroad that suffer because of U.S.-supported machi-

nitely complex, historically, politically, and culturally, and thus beyond the full comprehension of any person or group. Even societies ruled and ostensibly planned by dictators have informal, hidden, and spontaneous aspects that no one can fully grasp, especially outsiders. Written laws are often irrelevant to the unwritten rules and customs actually governing a society. And each society consists of many moving parts (religious, ethnic, etc.)

Anyone who still thinks a U.S. president with expert advisers can determine the opportune moment to send armed forces into a country to effect regime change — or to arm a presumed moderate opposition and have everything come out as planned fails to grasp this and hasn't been paying attention for the last dozen years. The same goes for anyone who still believes America's latest brain trust can smoothly dictate political events in another country, say Ukraine, from behind the scenes with money funneled through innocent-sounding organizations like the National Endowment for Democ-

The problem with these grand plans is that there are human beings on the other end — people who have their own preferences about what should take place and who are likely to resent foreign or foreign-backed interference. Another stumbling block to presidential world-building is that historical regional powers say, Russia or Iran - don't look kindly on the United States asserting its will in their neighborhoods, just as American presidents have not welcomed foreign influence in Latin America. To many people in the world, American exceptionalism means that the United States alone gets to regard every region as within its sphere of influence. Responses to American arrogance produce many of the "crises" that the chief executive will be accused of having failed to anticipate and preempt. But no one can hope to manage the world.

The basic failure is the intervention itself. There will be crises enough without a U.S. president helping to create them.

Afghanistan, Iraq, Syria, Libya, Palestine/Israel, Ukraine and so many more in the past are all variations on a theme. Ignorant intervention begets bad consequences - unintended or not - perhaps not for American politicians or those who peddle war materiel, but certainly for those who bear the brunt in the target countries and the Americans who kill, die, and pay the economic cost.

Managing world conflict is beyond the power of any mortal. Don't demand that a president do it.

The Prudent Alaskan Oil Man

By Sen. Bert Stedman

During legislative deliberations, advocates of the Senate Bill 21 oil tax consistently used North Dakota as an example of the ideal tax regime that Alaska should emulate. We were told that because of North Dakota's tax structure they are more competitive than Alaska resulting in huge increases in industry investment and rapid increases in production. If Alaska would just lower its tax to be more aligned with North Dakota, we would also benefit from rapid increases in investment and production. However the oil boom in North Dakota, along with Texas, is a result of the advancement of fracking technology that releases hydrocarbons previously trapped in shale rock and the private land ownership of the surface and subsurface. This boom is not tax driven.

In 1830, Massachusetts Supreme Court Justice Samuel Putnam established the Prudent Man Rule, a legal foundation for professional financial management that has been a guiding fiduciary principle in our country for nearly 200 years. Stemming from the case Harvard College v. Amory, Justice Putnam's Rule states, "All that can be required of a trustee to invest is that he shall conduct himself faithfully and exercise a sound discretion. He is to observe how men of prudence, discretion and intelligence manage their own affairs, not in regard to speculation, but in regard to the permanent disposition of their funds, considering the probable income, as well as the probable safety of the capital to be invested."

The State of North Dakota levies a combined production and extraction tax of 11.5 percent on the gross value of oil at the wellhead. In addition, the individual landowner, as the owner of the subsurface resource, negotiates a private royalty payment that averages 20 percent on the gross value of oil. But in Alaska, the citizens of the state own the subsurface resources collectively and the Alaska State Legislature has the constitutionally mandated fiduciary duty to set a fair sale price for public resources. Referring back to almost 200 years of Judge Putnam's Prudent Man Rule, I assure you that the prudent North Dakota farmer would never intentionally sell his hydrocarbon resources for less than the going rate, nor should Alaskans as owners of Prudhoe and Kuparuk

— the two largest conventional oil fields in North Amer-

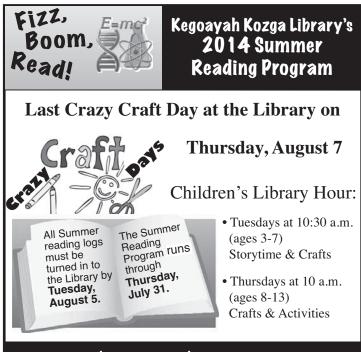

So how does Alaska's net tax and royalty regimes compare to North Dakota's gross tax and royalty system assuming the same number of barrels produced? In fiscal year 2013 (the last full year under the ACES oil tax), Alaska's tax and royalty generated $763 million more than we would have under North Dakota's tax and private royalty regime. Now that ACES has been replaced with Senate Bill 21, using fiscal year 2015 forecasts (the first full year under the new Senate Bill 21 oil tax), Alaska's tax and royalty will bring in $1.5 billion less than if we had North Dakota's tax and royalty. Since the goal of Senate Bill 21 was to make Alaska a more competitive place to invest by lowering our tax rate to something comparable to North Dakota, we missed the mark by $1.5 billion.

In addition, North Dakota hasn't provided fiscal incentives for the oil industry since 2004, whereas the per barrel credit in Senate Bill 21 is projected to average $6 per barrel produced at a cost to Alaskans of $953 million in fiscal year 2015 alone. That equals an effective tax rate of 21.9 percent, well below the 35 percent base tax rate that supporters of Senate Bill 21 want you to believe is what the industry pays. Furthermore, the fact that no incremental year after year sustained production increase is expected is a substantial deviation from what the Senate Bill 21 supporters were promised.

The prudent Alaskan man or woman would never accept the terms in Senate Bill 21 in setting the sale price of their subsurface oil. It's up to you, the owner, to go to the polls on August 19 and tell your government whether or not you believe we're selling your oil for a fair price. A "no" vote on Proposition 1 will retain the Senate Bill 21 oil tax and a "yes" vote will repeal Senate Bill 21. As for me, I am voting "yes".

Summercise keeps kids busy and active during summer break

By Diana Haecker

Too fit to quit was this year's motto at Summercise, an annual summer program for kids in Nome. Summercise is put on by the CAMP department of Norton Sound Health Corporation, with the stated goal to prevent diabetes in kids.

For the kids, diabetes prevention is probably the last thing on their minds as 150 of Nome's children flock to Summercise to have fun.

They can chose from a variety of classes: hula-hooping, self defense, basketball, floor hockey, rope jumping, Frisbee throwing, cheerleading, dancing and some more dancing, swimming, hiking and also how to Megan Timm, CAMP Prevention Program Coordinator, said that the nation suffers a diabetes epidemic abetes and obesity is to encourage kids to be active and eat healthy foods.

"For example, things that we teach the kids in the nutrition classes is to make them curious to try out new foods," she said. Oh yeah? How do you sell kale to a 10-year old? "You'd be surprised, they are willing to try everything," said Timm. "You just have to hide it. Throw kale in a smoothie and mask it with strawber-

Summercise is broken into two sessions, with two age groups each. This year, there were 50 children signed up in the 5- and 6-year-old class, seven years and older made up for the remaining 100 children. In order to tame a horde of that size, the CAMP department hired eight interns recruited from nutritional col-They in Nome and spend their days herding kids around, teaching them new sports or new tricks in preparing nutritional and healthy meals. They also help with nutritional programs at the Norton Sound Regional Hospital.

When the last day of Summercise came around on Thursday, July 24, there were some wet eyes and heartwrenching good-bye scenes.

Megan Timm said from her own experience that the Summercise program is one of the best recruiting mechanisms for her department. Timm was a Summercise intern and fell in love with Nome. When the job at the helm of CAMP became available, she applied, landed the job, convinced her fiancée at the time to relocate and both returned to Nome. Her husband, Justin Timm, is now a NPD officer and works with his K-9, Icon, on Nome's police force.

Other former interns also made it back to Nome to stay such as Kelly Keyes Zweifel and Kendra Miller.

This year, different programs were introduced into Summercise. In the second session, the children held Iron Chef Alaska competitions in cook-offs. There was an acting class. which culminated in an original play performed on Wednesday, July 23, with a nutritional message of the goodness of berries and how hard work pays off to achieve miracles. There was an intern, Joey Fonseca, who brought all ages of kids under his spell with his break dancing abilities, his passion for nutrition and his participation in every physical activity Nome has to offer between June and end of July.

The idea for Summercise was born in 2000.

Angie Gorn, now CEO and President of NSHC, worked at the CAMP department. She was working oneon-one with an eight-year-old boy recontinued on page 11 ferred by the physician for lifestyle changes because he was experiencing knee problems due to weight.

Gorn recommended physical activity but realized that there were no kids' activities he could participate in.

"I developed Summercise that summer because I realized there was a real opportunity in our region to provide nutrition and physical activity in a fun environment," Gorn wrote the Nugget in an email correspondence. "This little boy was my motivation and I knew that a more comprehensive education strategy was needed not only for him, but in our community. The goal was to teach the kids so they could go home and tell mom and dad what foods were healthy and which foods they should eat in moderation. It worked, because several parents mentioned throughout the years that their kids learned so much about healthy habits."

During the first Summercise, Gorn recruited three dietitian students for a 12-week unpaid internship. The program was held at Old St. Joe's Park and it was limited to 50 kids. "Unfortunately, it rained a lot that summer and we decide that the Recreation Center was a good back-up plan," remembered Gorn. The success of the first year expanded in 2001, when CAMP recruited seven dietitian students, partnered with the City of Nome and other community organizations. such as Nome Community Center. Summercise was also offered in Teller, Brevig Mission and Elim.

The program won the Dannon Institute's Community Nutrition Award in 2001, which provided a $5,000 stipend and a published report on the program.

Timm said she received 90 applications this year to fill eight intern positions. The program also hires 10 local high school assistants to help. Over 150 kids participate annually. The CAMP program at NSHC leads the program each year and Diabetes Prevention funding has made the program sponsorship possible, Gorn wrote.

As a mom herself, she added that both of her children, ages 7 and 8, have participated in the last two years. "It is self-satisfying when they come home and tell me, 'Mom, you shouldn't be eating that all the time' or 'Let's go for a bike ride because it burns off energy.' They also finish drinking their milk now because they know what's in it."

But best of all, the kids say, is the uplifting atmosphere. "It's very fun," said nine-year old Kellie Miller. "But I like most that everyone is so nice and understanding. I really like how everyone is encouraging us to be healthy and to keep active."

Peter selected to lead UAF rural, community, Native education

University of Alaska Fairbanks alumnus Evon Peter has been selected to serve as the new vice chancellor for rural, community and Native education at UAF.

Peter was selected from a field of 21 applicants after a national search. He will start Monday.

"It is exciting to join the dynamic teams of administrators, faculty and staff throughout UAF and the College of Rural and Community Development. I am thrilled at the opportunity to support and help build upon the strong legacy of excellence in academic and technical programs," he said. "As we approach the UAF centennial, I enviexpanded community partnerships, broadened incorporation of local and indigenous knowledge into the academic and technical programs, and a thriving and supportive learning environment for all of our students.'

Peter graduated from UAF in 1998 with a bachelor's degree in Alaska Native Studies. He is currently completing the final requirements for a master's degree in rural development. He began his professional career in 1998 as the coordinator for the UAF Yukon Flats Center and since then served in a variety of leadership positions in Native organizations and nonprofits. His consulting firm, Gwanzhii, LLC, provides strategic planning, program development and other services for private and public organizations.

As vice chancellor, Peter will be responsible for guiding UAF's rural and community education initiatives, promoting the inclusion of indigenous knowledge in university programs and advocating for Alaska Native education. The position is also responsible for the College of Rural and Community Development, which includes all of UAF's rural campuses and sites, as well as the UAF Community and Technical College.

Peter has a strong commitment to rural and Native education and he understands the important role of community colleges in meeting the workforce development needs of rural and urban Alaska, said Chancellor Brian Rogers.

"I was contacted by people from all over the state who were enthusiastic about his candidacy and felt he was the right person to succeed Bernice Joseph," Rogers said. ## Saying it Sincerely

By Rev. Ross Tozzi, pastor St. Joseph Catholic Church

Member of Nome Ministerial Society Contributions by Little Sister Damiene

July 30, the community of Nome bids a fond farewell to the Little Sisters of Jesus who have served the community of Nome since 1952. Sixty-two years ago, Little Sister Magdeleine, the foundress of the order, came to Nome and said, "This is a place that the Little Sisters need to be." I am sure many in the community feel this is still a place for the Little Sisters to be and are deeply saddened by their departure. The communities of Nome and Little Diomede and all who have encountered the joyful presence of the Little Sisters have been deeply enriched by their presence.

The special gift and charisma of the Little Sisters is a ministry of presence. They are not teachers. They are not nurses, nor are they social workers. They are women of prayer who have spent their time listening to Jesus and sharing the joy of the Risen Christ with others by living and witnessing among us with beautiful smiles, with kind words, with ears ready to listen and caring hearts ever ready to console. Through that prayerful presence, I believe they have helped all of us to better understand the depth of God's love for us.

On the 27th of May, Saint Joseph Church held a special Mass to say thank you to the Little Sisters for their 62 years of service. At that time, Little Sister Damiene spoke on behalf of all of the Little Sisters. With great affection, she recalled especially her joyful years of living on Little Diomede. Let me conclude as I share her wisdom.

"A big, big heartfelt thanks to all our friends in Diomede who are listening, to King Islanders who could not be here, the ones from the East End, and to all of the people from Nome: A heartfelt thank you!

You have heard that in a little while we will leave Nome to travel to Anchorage. To take this occasion, I am a little moved. I know I want to say a big quayanna. Quyanna from all of the Little sisters who spent many years on Diomede, many years at East End, many years in Alaska, Anchorage and also in Fairbanks.

"During all these many years that we spent here, we really felt like home. And when we had to go back to Fairbanks or to another place, they always said, 'Do you have to go?' and we used to reply, 'Yes, we just go to get warm and we will be back' and that was true because Diomede was not very warm, never. So we just went to Fairbanks to get warm.

"For all of the Little Sisters, especially the ones who came here in the '50s, Diomede was just like home. The Little Sisters were just uprooted from nice places in Europe and then planted on Diomede. But Diomede was home because all the people were so good to us, so friendly. They always watched that we had something to eat. Of course the store didn't have much but we learned how to live on subsistence. The fish and game from the sea . . . and we also went with the women picking greens, picking berries, and they told us how to do. We learned everything from them. We learned how to survive in a harsh climate and we loved it.

"I still love it, but with age, my body is getting a little broken down. You have heard that we will leave Nome to live in Anchorage. I have to go to another place but my heart will always be in Diomede. So do you hear it in Diomede?

"We will keep praying for you all. And we also hope you will pray for us. We pray especially for the young ones who need guidance and to feel God is on their side. You have to choose. It is all a matter of choice. So listen to your elders, listen to your people, listen to your teachers, listen to good friends and make your choice . . . a

"Be sure that we will always pray for you. May the Lord reward you for all the good deeds, for everything you did for us. We were just like a big family. Hear our love and again, quyanna for everything.

"Together let us pray the prayer of abandonment that the Little Sisters pray every evening.

I abandon myself into your hands; do with me what you will. Whatever you may do, I thank you: I am ready for all, I accept all.

Let only your will be done in me, and in all your creatures -I wish no more than this, O Lord.

Into your hands I commend my soul: I offer it to you with all the love of my heart, for I love you, Lord, and so need to give myself, to surrender myself into your hands without reserve, and with boundless confidence, for you are my Father. Amen.

"God bless you all."

Quayanna Lord for the gift of your love shared through the ministry of presence of the Little Sisters of Jesus. May we cherish our memories of their time with us and in turn witness to what they have taught

In the 2014 Annual Report to Congress, the Trustees announced:

- The combined trust fund reserves are still growing and will condo so through 2019. Beginning with 2020, the cost of the program is projected to exceed
- The projected point at which the combined trust fund reserves will become depleted, if Congress does not act before then, comes in 2033 - the same as projected last year. At that time, there will be sufficient income coming in to pay 77 percent of scheduled benefits.
- The projected actuarial deficit over the 75-year long-range period is 2.88 percent of taxable payroll -0.16 percentage point larger than in last year's report.

"The projected depletion dates of the Social Security Trust Funds have not changed, and three-fourths of benefits would still be payable after depletion. But the fact remains that Congress can ensure the long-term solvency of this vital program by taking action," said Carolyn W. Colvin, Acting Commissioner of Social Security. "The Disability Insur-Trust Fund's projected depletion year remains 2016, and legislative action is needed as soon as possible to address this financial imbalance.

Other highlights of the Trustees Report include:

- Income including interest to the combined OASDI Trust Funds amounted to $855 billion in 2013. ($726 billion in net contributions, $21 billion from taxation of benefits, $103 billion in interest, and $5 billion in reimbursements from the General Fund of the Treasury-almost exclusively resulting from the 2012 payroll tax legislation)

'Walt Hall' dedicated Job Corps celebrates 20 years of preparing students for jobs, life

By Heather A. Resz Frontiersman.com

PALMER - It was a day of looking back, of measuring progress and celebrating successes when the community joined with current and former students and staff Friday to laud the Alaska Job Corps Center's 20 years of service.

Valley dignitaries added their voices to the Alaska Congressional delegation, and an assortment of other politicians who sent letters or issued proclamations celebrating the center and the thousands of young Alaskans it has launched on trajectories toward their dreams.

Longtime Valley businesswoman and community supporter Janet Kincaid said she was there for the groundbreaking, too, swatting mosquitoes and waiting for Rep. Don Young to arrive.

"It's hard to believe it's been 20 years," she said.

Kincaid measured the center's success in terms of its role in the community. She recalled building the A Moosement Park in Palmer and the huge role Job Corps volunteers played in that project.

"We literally couldn't have done it without them," Kincaid said. "I ap-preciate Job Corps and the high standards that they set.'

Former borough manager Don Moore recalled the groundbreaking ceremony, too, noting that the lush campus was once an unused gravel

He said he's been pleased to hire and work with several graduates from the center during his career.

"You'll find Job Corps grads all over the state," Moore said. "They are everywhere."

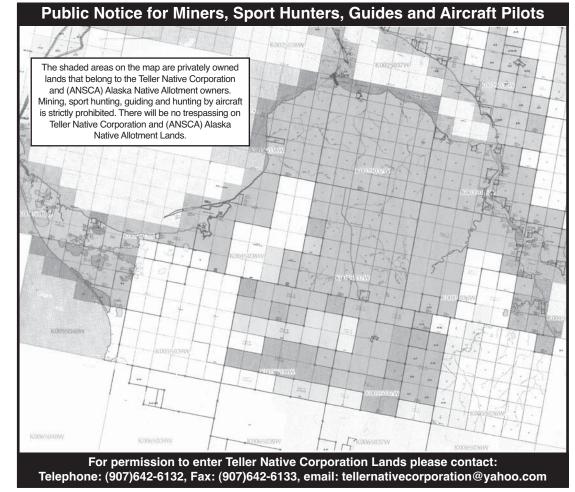

Palmer Mayor DeLena Johnson said when she meets other Alaska mayors in her role as president of the Mayors Association they know about Palmer through Job Corps. She said Job Corps students are great, if somewhat unwitting, ambassadors for Palmer and the Mat-Su Valley.

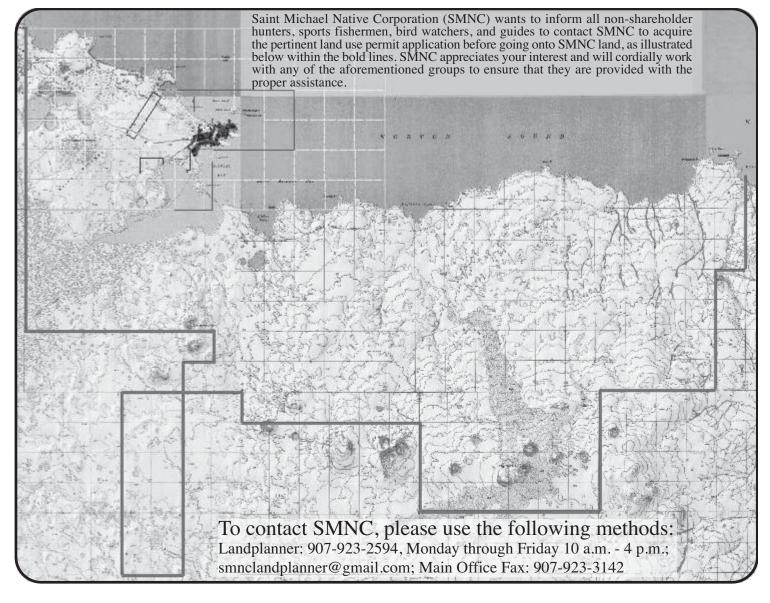

"As mayor, when someone mentions Job Corps to me, I know it's going to be followed by a compliment," Johnson said. "You are good for our community."

Photos of past students decorated the halls in the gymnasium where a banquet was organized Friday to mark and celebrate the historic an-50th anniversary of the federal Job Corps program, which operates similar programs in each state.

The centers, which provide qualified students with career training and employability skills at no cost, are crucial tools in this era of skyrocketing student loan debt, she said.

Smith said the way to measure 20 years is against the yardstick of student success.

About a dozen students from the center's first graduating class, including Naomi Bahnke, returned to help celebrate the milestone.

Her voice broke as she struggled to tell those in the audience what Job Corps meant to her and her then twoyear-old son.

She recalled her three years at Job Corps as the first time she felt safe and wanted.

"If I could have stayed longer than three years I would have," Bahnke said. "Walt, made you feel like you were part of the family."

That's Walt Hall, the Alaska Job Corps Center's first center director.

She said she's worked for the federal government for most of her career, the last 10 years in the computer department where she trains others.

"I could never repay what Job Corps has done for my family," Bahnke told the crowd on Friday.

Panganga Pungowiyi earned her human services certificate from Job Corps in 2010. She said reading the other alumni's stories she could see similarities in her own experience growing up.

Pungowiyi said Job Corps was the safest place she'd been since she was a small child. By the time she arrived at Job Corps at the age of 23, she said it had been 15 years or so since she was safe.

"I didn't tell the woman who took my application that I was being abused," she told the audience Friday. "I didn't tell the person who called to say I'd been accepted that I was in danger."

Pungowiyi said she didn't really understand the severity of her abuse until a woman at Job Corps showed her the "Wheel of Power and Con-

She said she gained work and life skills at the center.

"It wasn't just work skills I needed," Pungowiyi said. "I needed life skills, too.'

As a result of her leadership experience at the school, she said she now serves in leadership roles in her own community, such as on the board of the women's shelter, the church council, the Community Alcohol Safety Team; and the Nome Social Justice Task Force.

"I learned how to work harder at everything," Pungowiyi said.

She concluded her remarks to a standing ovation from the crowd of staff, students, dignitaries and fellow alumni members.

Janice Weiss was the master of ceremonies for the event and paused to tell the audience how powerful Pungowiyi's words were to her personally.

"Hearing your stories reminds me to look at every student every day and remember they have a story,'

She said many students who seek services at the center never feel comfortable sharing their stories, but everyone has a story.

"We must look at people as people," Weiss said.

Before the crowd regrouped for a ribbon cutting ceremony at its new Vocational Annex, Walt Hall — the center's first director — took a turn at the mike. He said the work center

"I honestly don't know of anything more important than what we do here, helping young people find their path," Hall said. "After 20 years, the quality of this program is just incredible.

For students in the room he shared a bit of wisdom.

"My advice to you is to give yourself the gift of personal honor," Hall said. "When you give your word,

Job Corps' Alaska Native dance group performed a couple of songs to kick off the ribbon-cutting portion of the celebration.

Jason Collins talked about the energy efficient new building, followed by Butch Ehmann of F-E Contracting who recalled working on the original $15 million project 20 years

Ehmann said he ordered the materials for the project and knows every board and every screw in the place.

"This was a very big project," he said, noting that it used 40, 40-foot truck loads of plywood.

Ehmann also shared an even earlier memory of the site. He said he remembers hauling gravel out of the pit to build a Palmer Airport runway when he worked for Hermon Broth-

Smith capped the day with one final announcement. The center's new building will be named in honor its first director, the Walt Hall Vocational Annex.

"After this, I swear I'm done crying for the day," Hall said, wiping his

Wildlife citation turned into warning to foster dialogue

Solutions sought to deal with urban musk oxen in Nome as attacks on dogs continue

By Diana Haecker

The citation handed to Icy View resident Diana Adams after shooting a musk ox in her front yard was dropped and turned into a warning last week.

Alaska Wildlife Trooper Michael Cresswell cited Adams for the illegal take of a musk ox out of season. "I changed the citation into a warning in the hope that we can foster a postive dialogue between all stakeholders and to find a solution to the musk ox situation problem," AWT Mike Cresswell told The Nome Nugget.

On July 17, Adams shot a twoyear old female musk ox, when a herd of the animals was moving through the northern part of Icy View. According to Adams, this is what unfolded: she notified the police that a large herd of musk oxen was in the residential area. She attempted to haze them out with her car. She yelled at two animals that were grazing next to her doorsteps.

She went inside to get a gun and loaded one birdshot cartridge and three slugs.

Returning outside, she made more noise and fired a warning shot. One animal ran off, the other approached a chain-link enclosure holding Adams' dog.

The musk ox was nose-to-nose with her dog, with only the fence separating them. When the musk ox lowered its head, Adams felt she had run out of options and shot at the an-

The musk ox walked off wounded and died shortly thereafter.

Adams was later handed a citation and given a court date.

Last week, the citation was amended into a warning, sparing her an appearance in court.

The law

The case has been dissolved, but the broader question remains what is considered a bona fide "Defense of Life and Property" situation.

Erin Lillie, legal counsel for Adams, said that the defense of life and property law leaves "quite a bit of room for interpretation." AWT Cresswell agrees with the assessment, saying that the law needs to address many scenarios and covers different species.

He said he gathers the facts and then sees if they align with the DLP

The language of the Alaska Code addressing DLP says that "...Nothing in 5 AAC prohibits a person from taking game in defense of life or property if: (1) the necessity for the taking is not brought about by harassment or provocation of the animal, or by an unreasonable invasion of the animal's habitat; (2) the ne-

Cruise ships turned away from Russia

By Diana Haecker

Last week, Nome saw an unusually high number of international tourists visiting the Gold Rush City.

An earlier than scheduled stop in Nome of the MS Hanseatic, a Hapag-Lloyd cruise liner sailing under Bahamian flag, resulted in more than 100 German visitors touring around town.

They panned for gold at East Beach, learned about sled dog driving in the Arctic, visited the Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum, the National Park Service and Nome's shops. They arrived a day early because a scheduled visit to Russia did not happen because they were denied access to shore.

The luxury cruise liner M/V Silver Discoverer, also sailing under the Bahamian flag, met the same fate the next day and another 100 or so international tourists spent the day in Nome, enjoying the same activities.

"Silversea Expeditions, which operates the expedition ship Silver Discoverer, confirms that upon arrival at the Russian region of Chukotka, on July 28, the guests were denied permission to go ashore," said Brad Ball, a company spokesman in an email to the Nome Nugget.

Ball wrote that the Silver Discoverer had received all the necessary clearances for passage into that area of Russia. Guests and crew had been cleared by immigration, but on arrival, were denied landing by the Russian authorities.

Coast Guard celebrates Coast Guard Day in Nome

Coast Guard officers from Sector Anchorage, Stations Juneau, Valdez and Kodiak as well as from North Pacific Regional Fisheries Training Center in Kodiak gathered in Nome's Old St. Joe's Hall on Monday, August 4, to hear Steve White, commanding officer of the U.S. Coast Guard Cutter Alex Haley deliver a short speech in honor of the 224th Coast Guard Day.

The Alex Haley arrived in Nome on Monday, 10 a.m.

Commanding officer White said he was so glad to see Nome, as the crew on the cutter had spent the past several days of their voyage in fog.

In a short welcome, Mayor Denise Michels addressed the 50 or so Coasties, highlighting the shared historic significance since the infamous Cutter Bear began sailing Alaskan waters in 1885.

Since then, Mayor Michels said, the Coast Guard and Nome share many common milestones, including the historic winter fuel delivery in 2012, when the Coast Guard Cutter Healy escorted the Russian tanker Renda to Nome to deliver fuel to Bonanza fuel tanks. "When the eyes of the world were on us, your professionalism and diligence made sure that not one drop of fuel was spilled in that historic delivery," Michels

She continued to laud the Coast Guard for patrolling the Bering Sea and Norton Sound region and for keeping a second set of eyes on industry as more traffic finds its way north to Nome and beyond.

Captain White said he was excited to be in Nome for the first time. "It's a real treat for me to be here today," he said. White said he was looking forward to learning from Nomeites as they are a unique blend of those who have been here for thousands of years and "newcomers" who followed their dreams, to find adventure and life a lifestyle different from most places.

As the Coast Guard spends more time in this region, he was looking forward to learn from residents.

Dear Editor:

What's wrong with this picture? Full page or half page color ads in the Nome Nugget and in all the newspapers in Alaska featuring former governor Tony Knowles and pictures of Fairbanks local union member and Fairbanks Chamber of Commerce members touting a Vote NO on Ballot Propositions One (the repeal of SB 21). And the screen blitz of TV ads touting same. I'm certain you've noticed that all these ads are paid for by the Big Oil companies.

We cannot ignore, nor should we, the six for-profit Native corporations also urging a NO vote on One. Ask yourself why.

Regardless of the US Supreme Court ruling, Corporations are not People! No one believes that. Corporations cannot vote as citizens. If they could, they would have only one vote. One vote. Big Deal! However, since and because of that ruling, for-profit corporations may advertise as People to try to influence votes on candidates and issues. How sad. For the for-profit corporations, the bottom line is money, not necessarily what's in the best interest of the over all good of the people they supposedly represent. Yes, it may mean a very few jobs for some local people but not for many. For sure not the "hundreds of local jobs" promised. We've heard that before and watched as outsiders take the lucrative jobs. Yes, shareholders may receive a very few extra dollars in the annual benefits pay out. This is the way the for-profits may use their money (your money) to try to influ-

An Informed Public

The role of a university is to support education and foster continued learning in as many innovative areas as possible. The University if Alaska Fairbanks has been a longtime member of the Alaska Public Radio Network, which has broadcast many programs dealing with relevant issues. "Talk of Alaska" and "Alaska News Nightly" are among the many programs from KUAC listener supported public radio.

Why should Nomeites care about a Fairbanks radio station? Well, KUAC is broadcast via a repeater in Nome at 91.3 on the FM dial. The loss of these APRN informative programs is due to legislative cuts of $15 million to the University's budget. In order to compensate for this loss the University had to slice $170,000 for KUAC's membership in the Alaska Public Radio Network. In doing so it silenced a news exchange from 25 member stations throughout Alaska.

Of course this public information could be restored if the Alaska Legislature would fund the $15 million to the University budget gap. Access to information keeps the public informed, and an informed public makes intelligent decisions. Perhaps our legislature feels more comfortable keeping Alaskans in the dark. Let's hope that is not the case and they infuse funds into our anemic system of higher education.

Coast Guard Research & Development Center preps for Arctic patrol

A team of scientists from the Coast Guard Research and Development Center will depart from Seward for a technology evaluation in the Arctic aboard the Coast Guard Cutter Healy Aug. 8.

The research center is leading a multi-agency team to support Arctic Shield 2014, a 17th Coast Guard District initiative. The purpose of their month-long evaluation is to improve Coast Guard capabilities in the Arctic region, specifically in the areas of boat operations, communications, navigational safety and oil spill response.

The research center collaborates with the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Cold Regions Research and Engineering Laboratory to assess improvements made to Coast Guard boats for enhanced capability in a cold weather environment. U.S. Northern Command and its contractor, Lockheed Martin Corp., will help to assess Mobile User Objective System satellite coverage at high latitudes. Marine Exchange of Alaska will provide critical Automatic Identification System infrastructure to help the Coast Guard transmit weather, ice and safety zone information to mariners through a cooperative research and development agreement. The National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the National Science Foundation, the National Ice Center, Space and Naval Warfare Systems Command, the University of Cambridge (U.K.) and the University of Washington's Applied Physics Laboratory will provide personnel, unmanned technologies and resources to help understand how a simulated oil spill moves in the water near the ice edge over a 48-hour period. Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation will have an observer aboard for this effort as well.

Ukpeaġik Inupiat Corporation president and CEO Anthony E. Edwardsen will serve as chairman of AIO. Edwardsen remarked, "Our values teach us that we achieve success by putting the needs of our community at the center of all that we do. It is important that our community has a seat at the table to represent the subsistence and economic needs of our shareholders. Through AIO we will have meaningful input into this process while providing benefits back to our shareholders.

"This is an important day for our Alaska Venture," said Shell Alaska Vice President, Pete Slaiby. "A regional alliance with so many respected Alaska Native Corporations provides Shell the opportunity to collaborate with savvy and experienced North Slope business partners going forward. It also underscores our commitment to provide opportunities for North Slope communities to directly benefit from Shell's activities offshore Alaska.'

Through the option agreement, Shell would assign to AIO an overriding royalty interest in oil and gas produced from specific Chukchi Sea leases. Shell and AIO will hold quarterly meetings to exchange information and address regional and development issues. The company is headquartered in Anchorage.

The formation of AIO drew praise from Governor Sean Parnell. "I applaud Shell's partnership with the Alaska Native corporations that will provide a greater voice and opportunity for the people in the region and a seat at the development table," Governor Parnell said. "This establishes a very positive precedent in Alaska's Outer Continental Shelf, showing strategic partnership among North Slope communities and Shell. both of which understand the importance of developing Alaska's offshore oil and gas resources.'

More than 300 days after it was boarded by Russian military during a protest against Arctic oil drilling, the Greenpeace ship Arctic Sunrise has departed Murmansk, Russia, en route for its home port of Amsterdam. The icebreaker has been held in custody since the 'Arctic 30' were apprehended on September 19, 2013. #### Alaska seafood is safe from Fukushima radiation

The Alaska departments of Environmental Conservation and Health and Social Services have received further results from the U.S. Food and Drug Administration on the latest radiation testing of Alaska seafood. The results confirm information from federal, state and international agencies that seafood in Alaska waters poses no radiation-related health concerns to those who consume it.

This testing of cod and three species of salmon (Chinook, chum, and sockeve) showed no detection of the Fukushima-related radioisotopes iodine-131, cesium-134, or cesium137. The results indicate no appreciable risk from any tested radionuclide in these fish and support previous radionuclide testing results of sablefish, pollock and halibut from Alaska waters. The samples were analyzed by standard techniques routinely used by the FDA to evaluate food safety. The fish samples were composites, containing tissue from several fish, and were collected using a statistical protocol. Samples were collected from the Aleutian/Bering Sea, Bristol Bay and Gulf of Alaska

The state of Alaska collaborates with the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, Alaska Native Tribal Health Consortium, Cook Inlet Keeper, North Slope Borough, U.S. Environmental Protection Agency, FDA, and others to compile and evaluate additional environmental sample data.

WELCOME TO NOME— The cruise ship Silver Discoverer tied up at the City Dock after it was refused entry to Russia, on July 28. It arrived in Nome on July 30.

REFUSED— The Hapag-Llyod cruise ship Hanseatic was refused entry to Russia. The ship arrived a day ahead of its scheduled arrival in Nome on July 29.

Cruise ships

The ship was sailing a 12-day itinerary from Seward to Nome, and was scheduled to call in the Chukotka region on the final few days of the voyage. They sailed via Little Diomede to Nome.

Their next voyage, a 14-day roundtrip sailing from Nome, departing July 31, which had included a few calls in the Chukotka region, has also been modified. Ports in the Russian region of Kamchatka were still offered.

The Hanseatic embarked from Nome on a voyage to Wrangel Island in the Chukchi, and as of Monday, posted a position report of sailing around the island.

The reasons for both cruise liners being turned away in the last week of July are murky. The Russian Consulate in Seattle did not return phone calls from the Nome Nugget.

Senators Lisa Murkowski's office and Mark Begich's office had no information on the incidents nor the reasons why the ships were turned away from Russian waters.

International relations tensed when Europe and the United States announced sharp economic sanctions against Russia.

According to the New York Times, European leaders and American leadership settled on a package of sanctions targeting Russia's financial, energy and military sectors on July 28.

The sanctions came as worries mounted that Russia is stepping up its interventions in Ukraine and collaborating with pro-Russian separatists in the Ukraine. International concerns grew when the Malaysian Airlines flight 17 was downed over eastern Ukraine in early July.

AK Bar Association president visits Nome

By Diana Haecker

Last week, President of the Alaska Bar Association and a staff member visited Nome to learn how well the administration of justice is working and what Nome's unique challenges are.

President Geoffrey Wildridge of Fairbanks and Pro Bono Director Krista Scully spent one day with the Nome legal community to find out.

The Alaska Bar Association administers bar exams in Alaska, enforces attorney ethics rules, offers continuing legal education and does fee arbitration in case of client-attorney fee disputes.

Wildridge said his focus lies on the administration of justice in light of a bill that recently passed the Alaska Legislature. The passing of Senate Bill 64 in April brought a sweeping reform to Alaska's prison system. The bill establishes a 24/7 Sobriety Program, which requires certain offenders to submit to twicea-day alcohol or drug testing; provides stricter penalties for attempted abduction, and increases the threshold for felony theft from $500 to $750. The bill also created the Alaska Criminal Justice Commission tasked to analyze and evaluate the effect of laws and practices within the state's criminal justice system. In addition it reforms the parole system to provide "swift and certain" punishment for violators.

Wildridge said this new law is intended to focus efforts on community approaches rather than the "throw away the key" mentality of the past several years since Governor Frank Murkowski chopped rehabilitation programs.

In rural Alaska problems with the administration of justice entail limited lawyer availability, high costs due to the necessity to sometimes hire attorneys from other communities, the scarce availability of probono services and also the lack of alcohol and drug rehabilitation programs.

Scully said the Alaska Bar Association encourages lawyers to offer pro bono work in the civil arena for low-income clients. The organization, made up of approximately 3,000 active members, also works with Alaska Legal Services to support and increase volunteerism. Scully added that during the annual Convention of the Alaska Federation of Natives, the Alaska Bar Association offers free consultation services to delegates on civil matters or drafting simple wills. After a one-hour free consultation, Scully said, about 85 percent of the cases are handled and resolved the day of the appointcial actions proposed by petitioners. There was no action taken.

The requests were to "ensure reasonable opportunity and priority use of subsistence resources" and to "exert Federal jurisdiction for fisheries management on the Kuskokwim River for the remainder of the 2014 fishing season."

According to Deborah Coble, Subsistence Outreach Coordinator with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the Subsistence Board has reviewed these requests and has decided to defer action on them. The Board's decision was based on current State of Alaska, Division of Commercial Fisheries action, which suspended commercial fishing in the Kuskokwim River.

The Board continues to monitor the situation on the Kuskokwim River, and by deferring this special action, reserves the right to act on these requests if new information or a change in conditions indicates Board action is warranted.

Speaking for the Board, Geoffrey L. Haskett, Regional Director for the US Fish and Wildlife Service said, "I would like to recognize the collective efforts by lower river and upper river residents to conserve Chinook salmon runs this season so that they will be available for future generations. We know that the sacrifices that have been made have been extremely difficult and that it is very critical that all people along both the lower river and upper river be given every opportunity to meet their subsistence needs."

The Board agreed that they will continue to closely monitor the situation on the Kuskokwim River and if conditions change, the Board would take action quickly to ensure that a priority for subsistence users is provided and protected, a press release said.

Body of missing man found

Alaska State Troopers report that the body of Clarence Ray Olanna, 21, was found last week.

According to AST spokeswoman Beth Ipsen, a Brevig Mission VPSO and volunteer searchers found a body three miles west from Brevig Mission, on Thursday, July 31.

Olanna seemed to have been washed ashore; his body was found on the beach. There are no obvious signs of foul play.

Olanna was reported missing on July 15. The next day, Search and Rescue volunteers found clothes matching his on the shore near Brevig Mission. "The clothes were left in a manner that suggest he took them off voluntarily," Ipsen said. Stormy weather and rough seas kept

SAR from launching boats that day, but the next day, five boats and two four-wheelers went searching for Olanna

An Army National Guard Blackhawk flew for approximately 2.5 hours over land and water surrounding the village.

In the following days volunteers in boats – when weather was cooperating — and on ATVs continued searching without results. The troopers suspended their involvement in the search on July 21.

Olanna was found dead 10 days later. His remains were sent to the State Medical Examiner's office in Anchorage for an autopsy after his family was notified. No foul play is suspected.

KUAC-FM cuts statewide news programming

By Weston Morrow, Fairbanks News-Miner

wmorrow@newsminer.com
Fairbanks-based KUAC will no longer receive and share content with other radio stations throughout Alaska beginning in September.

The public broadcasting organization, which operates both television and radio programming, will drop its membership to the Alaska Public Radio Network on Aug. 31.

The decision to cut ties with APRN came as a result of budget cuts from the University of Alaska Fairbanks. UAF announced this spring it would reduce KUAC's budget by $170,000.

The university is facing a budget gap of $12 million to $15 million, partly because of funding reduction from the Legislature.

Without its membership to Alaska Public Radio Network, KUAC will lose its content sharing agreement with the other 25 member stations around the state. KUAC will no longer be able to broadcast reports from other member stations.

The Fairbanks station will also lose several shows in its radio lineup. The station will lose "Talk of Alaska," a statewide show where Alaskans are encouraged to call in and discuss relevant issues with host Steve Heimel and guests, and "Alaska News Nightly," which aggregates news from public radio stations around the state.

"Talk of Alaska" has been airing on KUAC at 10 a.m. Tuesdays, while "Alaska News Nightly" has been airing at 6 p.m. Monday through Fri-

KUAC's general manager, Keith Martin, said the station made the decision to drop APRN because, out of its options, the move will have the least effect on programming.

"The whole point is to minimize the impact to on-air operations. Quite frankly, there's nowhere to go," Martin said. "The sheer amount I'd have to cut from other programs would end up leaving huge gaping holes in our programming."

KUAC is a member of several public broadcasting networks.

In addition to the Alaska Public Radio Network, the station belongs to Public Radio International, National Public Radio and American Public Media.

If the station were to leave American Public Media, for example, it would lose eight programs and would save the station even less money, according to Martin.

"There's just no good direction here," he said.

If KUAC is able to bridge its budget gap, the Alaska Public Radio Network will be the first thing to come back, Martin said. Martin spoke Monday with the Steve Lindbeck, the general manager of Alaska Public Media, the organization that operates the radio network, about the decision to leave. Martin said he broached the possibility of still sharing content with member stations but was shot down.

In a phone interview Tuesday, Lindbeck said sharing with KUAC as a non-member would set an unfair precedent.

"All the member stations are paying their dues," Lindbeck said. "That's the price of admission."

Lindbeck did say that KUAC could possibly make a deal with individual stations regarding content sharing, but the station would not be able to share content through the umbrella of the radio network.

KUAC will save about $33,500 per year by leaving the network. The station also plans to reduce a full-time position in its development department to half-time. Martin said that reduction should save the station another $34,000.

Even with both of the reductions, KUAC must still find an additional $100,000 in savings to cover its budget gap.

"It doesn't even get me halfway there," Martin said. "We're still working on that, closing that gap."

The $170,000 cut from KUAC's budget by the university is equal to about 15.5 percent of UAF's total funding to the station.

KUAC is one of the largest public broadcasting stations in the Alaska Public Radio Network. Because of that, Lindbeck said, losing the station would be a major blow to the network's budget as well.

"It's a $33,500 hole in the budget," he said. "I don't have anything specific. It'd be a little bit less here and a little bit less there."

Lindbeck said he thought the biggest issue with losing KUAC will be the fact that stations around Alaska will lose access to Fairbanks news reports, while audiences in Fairbanks will lose access to statewide coverage.

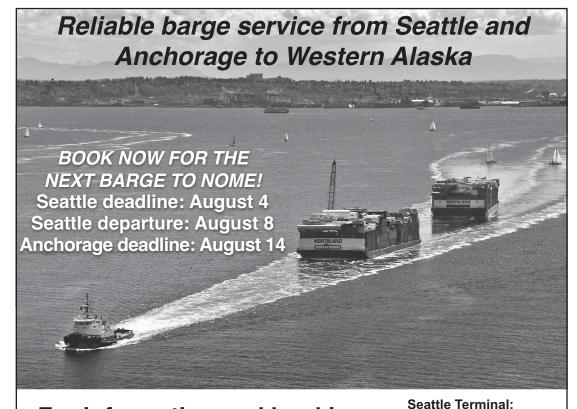

"I just mourn to see this kind of change happen," Lindbeck said. "KUAC was the first public broadcasting outlet in Alaska. It was at the founding of APRN. It's been a leader since the beginning, and I just think it would be quite sad to lose its participation in this way."

Lindbeck hasn't given up hope on KUAC's membership. He said, in the days and weeks ahead, the network will continue to try to convince KUAC not to leave the fold.

cessity for the taking is not brought about by the improper disposal of garbage or a similar attractive nuisance; and (3) all other practicable means to protect life and property are exhausted before the game is taken."

In the context of Diana Adam's specific case, Lillie said, "To me, the situation boiled down to having done everything practicable before one actually kills a game animal in defense of life and property. Diana described to me that her dog was nose to nose to the musk ox. At that point, she felt she was out of options. That is where Diana's and Wildlife Trooper Cresswell's opinions differed."

Cresswell said he found that the third requirement of having exhausted all practicable means had not been fully met. "But it was sufficiently marginal to change the citation into a warning," Cresswell said.

All involved now want to use this incident as a teachable moment and focus on the question of how to deal with musk oxen inside town. Cresswell said that Nome is in a very unique situation to have an urban musk ox population. He made clear that nothing in the regulations he enforces prohibits a person from defending his or her life if he or she feels genuinely threatened by wild game animals. He said he wants to use this incident as an impetus to move forward and have a fruitful discussion to come up with sensible solutions to Nome's unique challenges.

Adams also said she wants to help work on a solution to the bigger question of how to get musk oxen moved out of town and away from people and their pets. "I want people to take my issue aside and focus on a solution," she said. But emotions run high after a week of additional musk ox attacks on dogs: On July 26, a musk ox fatally gored Adams' kennel partner Mitch Erickson's dog at the Nome dog lot. On Thursday, July 31, another dog was attacked by a musk ox near the old Glacier Creek Road. It was injured in the hindquarters. Nome's veterinarian Dr. Derrick Leedy operated on the animal and it's recovering. Dr. Leedy said that over the past few years, he's had operated on at least five dogs injured by musk oxen.

Now what?

Nome residents expect wildlife managers to solve the problem and ask what can be done? But a solution needs to be found by all stakeholders.

The Nome Kennel Club sent letter to the City of Nome and asked for a solution. A recent push came in form of an online petition, addressed to ADF&G wildlife biologist Tony Gorn. It is titled "Find workable solutions for the Musk-Ox that are continually harassing our people and killing our dogs." As of Friday the petition has gathered 129 signatures. The petition states that "Since as long ago as 2005 the Musk-Ox have been coming into Nome's small community and not only becoming a nuisance and danger to the public, but harming our dogs that are secured on chains or in pens as well. Some incidences have resulted in severe injuries or death to the dogs."

Without naming names, it retells the story of a musk ox shot and the defender being charged by wildlife authorities. "This is nonsense and has got to stop," the petition reads.

"Enough dogs have been injured and killed; we do not want children or any person to endure an attack, when a change will be made. Let's do it before that happens." The petition calls for a change and encourages "The Alaska Dept. of Fish & Game, in Nome and Juneau Alaska, to find workable solutions to this ongoing problem by signing our petition."

ADF&G biologist Tony Gorn responded, "I don't need a petition to tell me that there are concerned citizens worried about musk ox numbers around Nome." He said he had several productive meetings recently. "We all have to understand there is local frustration with some residents and also residents who like living with musk oxen," he said. Some favor the newly instated hunt that changed the seasons at the Unit 22C hunt to allow hunters to harvest musk ox beginning August 1. That day, Gorn said, a hunter reported his first harvest. "I've already received comments from the public opposing the Aug. 1 season date we recently changed," Gorn said. Others still like to see musk oxen around - on the hills, but not in town – and yet others want them gone. "These polarized opinions are what makes our situation difficult," said Gorn.

He added that urban wildlife issues aren't a unilateral ADF&G problem. "There are examples all over Alaska where residents live with moose, brown bears, and black bears in their backyards," Gorn said in an email correspondence with the Nugget." It's not realistic to think Fish & Game can create a musk ox free zone around Nome. Fish & Game also can't make moose populations recover overnight, or change the distribution of brown bears to keep them out of camps, dumps, etc."

Gorn said that residents may have to take some of ADF&G recommendations more seriously. He lists several mitigation measures that residents can take: Knocking back brush increases visibility; establishing a well-anchored chain linked fences to protect dogs. Not running dogs in front of vehicles in heavily brushed trails where visibility is obscured.

Over the course of several years, ADF&G biologists in Nome experimented with several methods to find a solution. "We've tried tasers, rubber bullets, high pressure water, walking them, cracker shells, bear urine, bear decoys and helicopters," described Gorn. Some methods are more effective than others but none have proven to be the silver bullet to keep musk oxen away. "We suspect musk ox are close to town because of the presence of predators so it may prove difficult to identify a hazing technique more stressful than wolf and brown bear predation."

Gorn has tried to find other communities in Canada or Greenland, but has been unsuccessful to find other biologists with similar experiences related to nuisance musk ox. "It seems our urban musk ox situation is unique," he said.

Population decline

To complicate matters, musk oxen population numbers are in decline. That makes it a hard sell when people suggest that musk oxen should be killed in greater numbers. According to Gorn, the overall musk ox population is declining 13 percent annually. "We know from our collared sample that natural mortality rates exceed 20 percent." Long-term recruitment rates are around 10 percent. "Generally speaking there are a lot of discouraging red flags in the population right now. If Nome was not experiencing urban musk ox problems I would strongly recommend conservative harvest rates, and staying that course until population metrics increased," Gorn said. "If the public ultimately wants to harvest more animals we have to understand any population recovery could take longer or we could increase the current decline because of the additional harvest. It's a tough situation to be in and future meetings will likely provide managers with additional information to help guide future

"In 2012, we found just over 2,200 animals on the Seward Peninsula and the Nulato Hills north of the Unalakleet River," said Gorn. A 2014 survey failed because of the lack of snow cover to efficiently count the animals. "I can't speculate on how many animals are in Unit 22C (the subunit that Nome is in) because we know that our musk ox have the ability to move between our subunits quickly."

In 2005 ADF&G counted 220 musk ox in Unit 22C; in 2007 ADF&G counted animals. "This increase wasn't because of productivity alone, but because of productivity and movement of animals into Unit 22C from adiacent subunits," explained Gorn. "We know from our sample of radio collars in the population, there are likely around 125-150 musk ox in the local Nome area right now, and of course they have the potential to move further away or closer to Nome in relatively short time periods." ADF&G plans another attempt to survey musk ox next spring and to collar additional musk ox this October.

Dealing with a hot situation

Gorn said Nome ADF&G staff routinely respond to wildlife calls at the office or if contacted by the Nome Police Department after normal business hours. "We've tried several methods to haze musk ox but nothing has proven effective at this point," he said. Moving groups of musk ox is relatively easy with three biologists, he said. "I prefer the public contact ADF&G rather than moving wildlife by themselves."

Musk ox groups can be moved, but they can sometimes become stubborn, particularly during the months of August and September when bulls enter the rut, he said. "At this point our staff of biologists have been able to handle the additional workload by working additional hours and staying in close contact after normal business hours."

AWT Cresswell suggested calling police if a situation arises. Police dispatch will then call out the appropriate agencies to respond. Asked if there is a mechanism to have professionally trained people dispatch of nuisance wildlife rather than civilians, Cresswell said that this would be a policy question that needs to be addressed at a higher level.

This and other questions will be brought up at a planned Nome Common Council work session on August 26, to discuss ways to deal with the musk ox issue of Nome.

Coast Guard perform dockside exams in Nome, board vessels

Bv Diana Haecker

As part of operation Arctic Shield 2014, the Coast Guard District 17 out of Juneau is in town to perform a second round of dockside exams for vessels and also to conduct boardings, said Coast Guard Public Affairs officer Grant DeVuyst.

The Coast Guard offered free dockside exams earlier this season, in which the officers checked if all necessary safety equipment was on board fishing or gold dredge vessels.

Gold dredges – no matter the size or horsepower propulsion — are considered recreational vessels and are treated by those standards. Dockside examiners check for lifejackets, flares, communication devices such as whistles, horns or radios and fire extinguishers on board. Those who pass the exam get a Coast Guard decal, valid until the end of next calendar year.

Dockside inspections by Lt. Tom Pauser and Lt. Jr-grade Kat Martorelli will be offered until Friday. Interested mariners can get their name on a list at the Harbormaster's office for dockside exams.

Boardings are conducted by a different crew. They are officers from the Coast Guard station in Juneau, operating on a smaller boarding vessel flown in from Valdez.

Last week, they flew the 25-ft. boat to Nome with a C-130 Hercules, complete with truck and trailer, to see how fast those vessels could be deployed and to test their readiness.

The boat crew has the right to board any vessel and that's not voluntary.

In order to fulfill all 11 statutory missions of the Coast Guard, Arctic Shield 2014 is part of an ongoing process to learn what works in the Arctic and what doesn't. The closest Coast Guard station is in Kodiak.

Faced with the projected increase in ship traffic while there are no permanent Coast Guard bases north of Kodiak, the agency seeks to understand their capability to respond to accidents or oil spills through operation Arctic Shield, which began in 2012

Norton Sound and Kotzebue end of July fish report

By Jim Menard, ADF&G CRAB:

The catch through Friday was 316,000 pounds by 33 vessels.

The number of CDQ crab permit holders registered jumped from 2 to 18 once the closure to the open access was announced on July 30. The closure was at noon August 2. Historically with a three day notice fishermen bring in approximately 60,000 pounds so this should be close to the guideline harvest level of up to 354,090 pounds without going over. Fishermen have until noon August 3 to deliver their catch so with the good weather there is the possibility of not only going up to the GHL, but going over.

SALMON:

Norton Sound

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon catches this season are: 280 kings, 93,000 chums, 180,000 pinks, 400 reds and 16,000 silvers by 80 permit holders. The chum salmon harvest will fall within the department forecast range of 80,000 to 110,00 fish, but the pink salmon harvest will fall short of the department forecast of 250,000 to 500,000 fish. The silver salmon forecast range for the commercial fishery is a harvest of 60,000 to 90,000 fish.

The department has now shifted to silver salmon management as silver catches are no exceeding chum salmon catches. Good silver catches are occurring in the commercial fishery and silver escapement counts are average for this early in the season

Dropping river levels to the east of Nome have allowed most of the escapement counting projects to resume operations.

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited and the use of bait is banned until August 15 or subsequent emergency order in the Unalakleet River drainage. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence salmon gillnet fishing, with nets restricted to 6 inches or less mesh size, is open in the marine waters and in the Unalakleet River drainage, below the Chiroskey River and in all other fresh waters.

North River Tower – Camp J.B. - Escapement goals: King 1,200-2,600; Chum-No goal established; Pink 25,000; Silver 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal) – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count for 12 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26 with half day counts and full day counts beginning on July 29. Cumulative counts through July 31 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,300 kings, 10,000 chums, 142,000 pinks and 300 silvers.

Unalakleet River Floating Weir – No weir escapement goals yet established – cooperative project; Fish & Game, Native Village of Unalakleet, United States BLM and NSEDC. Major funding provided by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service – Office of Subsistence Management.

The weir crew was unable to count for nearly six days because of high water and full day counts resumed on July 27. Cumulative counts through July 31 should be considered minimal for all species and were 1,000 kings, 40,000 chums, 1.2 million pinks, 185 reds and 1,000 silvers.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited and the use of bait is banned until August 15 or subsequent emergency order in the Shaktoolik River drainage. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence salmon gillnet fishing, with nets restricted to 6 inches or less mesh size, is open in the marine waters and in all fresh waters.

Cumulative counts through July 13 were 2,000 kings, 38,000 chums and 395,000 pinks. The crew has been unable to count since July 13 due to high water. When the crew cannot count from the tower the sonar counts are then used, but on July 14 the sonar tumbled into the deepest part of the channel, but with water now dropping the crew is attempting to retrieve it.

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited until August 15 or subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence fishing is open 7 days a week.

Cumulative counts through July 12 were 1,600 kings, 61,000 chums, and 62,000 pinks. The camp was washed out during the high water and is no more.

Elim Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited until August 15 or subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited when hook and line fishing until August 15 or subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Kwiniuk River Tower – Camp Joel – Escapement goals: King 300-550; Chum 11,500 – 23,000; Pink 8,400; Silver 650-1,300 (aerial survey goal). Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 1 were 426 kings, 40,000 chums, 325,000 pinks and 700 silvers. The chum count ranks seventh best in the 50-year project history. The average historical first quarter point for silvers in August 8.

Golovin Subdistrict

Sport Fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited until August 15 or subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Subsistence fishing: The retention of king salmon is prohibited when hook and line fishing until August 15 or subsequent emergency order. Any king salmon incidentally hooked must be immediately released in the water.

Fish River Tower – No escapement goals established – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game

The tower crew was unable to count for 11 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26. Cumulative counts through August 1 should be considered minimal for all species and were 900 kings, 42,000 chums, 200,000 pinks, 15 reds and 1,300 silvers.

Nome Subdistrict

For the fifth consecutive year the Nome Subdistrict escapement goal range of 23,000-35,000 chum salmon has been exceeded.

The subsistence set gillnet fishing schedule in the marine waters west of Cape Nome is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Saturday. The marine waters east of Cape Nome are open seven days a week. The fresh water subsistence area set gillnet schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Check the back of the Nome Subdistrict subsistence salmon permit for the subsistence areas where set gillnetting is allowed. Beach seining is not allowed.

All pink salmon subsistence catch limits throughout Nome Subdistrict are waived, and except for the Solomon, Penny and Cripple rivers all chum salmon subsistence catch limits are waived throughout Nome Subdistrict. The Penny and Cripple rivers are closed to all fishing for chum salmon by regulation. There are no subsistence salmon catch limits in the marine waters. The Solomon River chum salmon catch limit is 40 fish. Check the back of the subsistence salmon permit for the silver salmon catch limits that vary by river.

Commercial salmon fishing will remain closed until the department projects there are sufficient silvers for both subsistence and escapement.

The project completed operations on July 27 with cumulative counts of 18 kings, 27,054 chums and 46,693 pinks. The chum salmon escapement ranked second highest in 18 years and this year was the fifth consecutive year the chum salmon escapement goal range has been exceeded

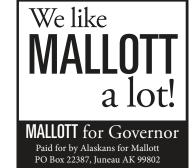

Nome River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 2,900 - 4,300; Pink 13,000 - Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

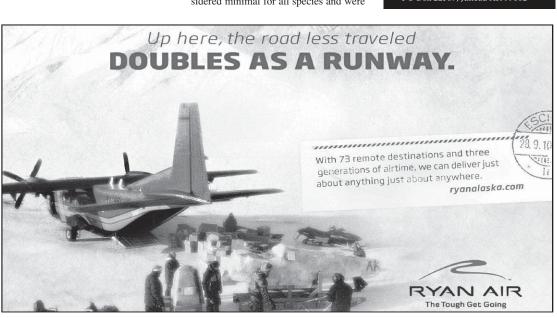

Cumulative counts through August 1 were 4,600 chums, 82,000 pinks, 13 reds and 25 silvers. The average historical third quarter point of chum passage at the weir is August 1. The last four out of five years the chum salmon escapement goal range has been met or exceeded.

Snake River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 1,600 - 2,500 - A cooperative project between Fish & Game and NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 1 were 5 kings, 3,300 chums, 15,000 pinks, 13 reds and 4 silvers. The average historical third quarter point of chum passage at the weir is July 28. The last four out of five years the chum salmon escapement goal range has been exceeded.

Solomon River Weir – No escapement goals yet established – Fish & Game proj-

Kot

Cumulative counts through August 1 were 1,249 chums and 18,500 pinks. Last year by this date the count was 1,153 chums with a final count of 1,377 chums.

Glacial Lake Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey): Red 800 – 1,600 – A cooperative project between and Fish & Game and NSEDC.

A video system is being used exclusively this year and cumulative counts through July 14 were 3,970 reds, 1 beaver and 1 otter. The counts are the highest since 2006, but have dropped off since July 8.

Port Clarence District

The Pilgrim River and Lower Kuzitrin River have reopened to net fishing.

Pilgrim River Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake & Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake): Red 4,000 - 8,000 - Cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through August 1 were 43 kings, 11,400 chums, 4,000 pinks, 8,000 reds and 12 silvers. In the last 5 days the sockeye passage has been building and the August 1 count of 586 reds passing was the fourth highest daily count of the season.

There have been 240 Pilgrim River subsistence salmon permits issued this season; the third highest number in the 51 years permits have been required.

Kotzehue

In July the commercial cumulative catch blew past the 2014 department forecast of 250,000 to 275,000 chum salmon commercial harvest for the entire season. Monday night's 8-hour fishing period was one of the greatest fishing periods in the history of the fishery with nearly a quarter of the entire July harvest caught in one night. With only three weeks into the fishery, and a month to go, the 2014 Kotzebue commercial chum salmon harvest may rank in the Top 5 harvests and will easily be in the Top 10. There are three major buyers this year compared to only one major buyer for the previous ten years. Suddenly a quiet fishery has heated up. The price has been dropping throughout the past week from a season high of 78 cents a pound to 45 cents a pound.

Preliminary cumulative catch through August 1 was 304,000 chum salmon by 65 permit holders.

Kobuk River Test Fish - Fish & Game project.

The test fishing chum salmon catch index has been hitting highs like the Hallelujah Chorus with the greatest catch index for the month of July in the 22-year project history. For the last three days, beginning July 30, the crew has had the greatest one-day chum salmon catch indices of any days in project history. Shortening fishing times has done little to slow the catch and Kiana residents have been busy cutting fish provided by the test fish crew. The crew will start taking some days off to slow down the amount of fish that are being harvested and relieve cramping hands.

Sound Off

Massive tax concessions fail to stem production decline Proponents of SB 21 say drop is stopped, decline is arrested: facts say otherwise

ANCHORAGE –Alaska's own Department of Revenue ANS production reports show that despite promises of increased production and a goal of one million barrels spurred by billion dollar tax concessions in SB 21, throughput in the Trans-Alaska pipeline continues to decline.

"I decided to fact-check the claims that the so-called More Alaska Production Act has 'stopped the drop' in production decline. It turns out that reality does not match up with their rhetoric. By every objective measure, Alaska North Slope production levels continue to drop," stated Senator Hollis French (D-Anchorage).

Year-to-year (August 1, 2012 -July 31, 2013 vs. August 1, 2013 -July 31, 2014), year-to-date (Jan. 1 - July 31, 2013 vs. Jan. 1 - July 31, 2014), and month-to-month (July 2013 vs. July 2014) comparisons all show drops in production. A yearto-year 2013-2014 comparison shows a 2.5% production decline. A year-to-date 2013-2014 comparison shows a 3.5% production decline. The July 2013 to July 2014 month-to-month comparison show an astounding 18% decline equivalent to 75,000 less barrels of oil through the Trans-Alaska pipeline.

"What the data confirms is we have reached the worst of both worlds: declining production combined with less resources to maintain our roads, educate our children, and keep our communities safe. All this while the industry takes a bigger share of our oil. There is no new production, just continued decline," stated Senator French. "Alaskans need to know that the claims of more oil are false," French concluded.

Alaska dishes up dazzling profits for the oil industry as Alaska sinks deeper into

Profits are far greater in Alaska than in the Lower 48 for less oil produced; ConocoPhillips says Alaska oil production will continue to decline

ANCHORAGE – July 31 ConocoPhillips announced $627 million in 2nd quarter profits from their Alaska operations or nearly $7 million per day from Alaska alone. On an hourly basis that equates to almost $300,000 in profits each and every hour.

At the same time, they announced Lower 48 profits of only $265 million from a greater volume of crude oil production – 191,000 barrels per day in the Lower 48 compared to 170,000 in Alaska.

"This proves beyond a shadow of a doubt that Alaska remains one of the most profitable places in the world," said Senator Bill Wielechowski (D – Anchorage). "Oil profits in Alaska are more than double what they are in the Lower 48."

Conoco's Alaska profits per barrel rose from $29 in 2012 to $31 in 2013 to $34 so far in 2014. "While Alaskans face growing deficits and cuts to essential public services, the industry's profits swell," said Senator Bill Wielechowski. "In the Lower 48 and Latin America, they make about $6 per barrel of oil equivalent. In Canada, they make about $10.50 per barrel. In Alaska this year, they are making $34 per barrel."

Wielechowski noted that Conoco's Alaska profits rose even as their Alaska production fell. ConocoPhillips produced six thousand barrels per day more in the same quarter last year, but made $42 million more this 2nd quarter than last

"They call it the More Alaska Production Act, but really it should be called the "Make Alaska Poor Act," he said. Had Senate Bill 21 – been in effect for the past six years, Alaskans would have lost $8.5 billion, according to the Parnell Administration.

Despite television commercials ConocoPhillips and others have been running trying to convince Alaskans they plan to increase oil production in Alaska, ConocoPhillips recently told a group of investors it actually plans on continued decreasing production in Alaska. In that same presentation, ConocoPhillips touted plans for skyrocketing production in the Lower 48, Latin America, Canada and Europe.

Meanwhile, as Alaska's savings accounts are being rapidly depleted, Wielechowski noted that ConocoPhillips just this month announced a 6 percent increase in its quarterly dividend to shareholders. "It would appear that instead of reinvesting in Alaska to increase oil production, the windfall profits are simply going back to ConocoPhillips' shareholders," Senator Wielechowski lamented.

ConocoPhillips earnings report can be viewed here (see pages 12 and 19 of the 8-K report filed on July 31, 2014):

Close Votes By Gail Phillips

In Alaska, we like our elections razor-thin — particularly in the primary when most of the electorate stays home.

Four years ago was a particularly good year for close elections. Despite a white-hot U.S. Senate race and an important abortion ballot measure, only a third of the electorate bothered to vote in the primary. That was the primary that saw Dan Sadler beat off Bill Cook by four votes, Eric Feige down Don Haase by 12 votes and Pete Fellman by 19 and Joe Miller outpoll Sen. Lisa Murkowski by a mere 4.5 votes per precinct.

Both Sadler and Feige sailed to easy victory in the 2010 general election when 52 percent of the electorate opted to vote: Sadler by 55 percent and Feige by 59 percent. Lisa waged her historic write-in campaign that fall, besting Miller by just over 11,000 votes, or 26 votes per precinct.

This tradition dates back to 1867 when the Senate ratified the treaty that approved the Alaska purchase by a single vote (it required a two-thirds majority). One was also the margin of victory for Ann Spohnholz in the Democratic District 1 primary in 1996 when 30 percent of the electorate made it to the polls.

With 32 percent of voters bothering to participate in the 2006 primary, Bryce Edgmon and Carl Moses ended up tied after a recount, with 765 votes each. Edgmon won on a coin toss.

With so many elections too close for comfort, it's vitally important that Alaskans make a real effort to vote on August 19. In addition to the hotly contested U.S. Senate race, there's Ballot Measure 1, which will determine if we continue to stem the decline in oil production – as we have under tax reform – or return to the failed policy of ACES.

Under ACES, North Slope production plummeted by more than 200,000 barrels a day, which meant that Alaska missed out on the great oil boom that swept the nation. Every oil and gas-producing state except Alaska managed to increase production during the years ACES was law: North Dakota up 58 percent, Texas up 36 percent, Colorado up 25 percent.

In 1989, Alaska's oil production accounted for 25 percent of U.S. production. Today that number has slipped to 7 percent even though Alaska's oil and natural gas deposits account for almost 30 percent of the nation's energy reserves. The reason is ACES.

In a state where oil funds 90 percent of the General Fund, declining production is a threat we cannot afford. But to keep tax reform working for Alaska, Alaskans need to vote.

Alaska gives its voters lots of ways to vote: by absentee, early voting, at the airport or in person at your local precinct on Election Day. You can find all the options online at www.elections.alaska.gov.

Whatever voting method is most convenient for you, just be sure to vote – because your vote could be the deciding one. Like the 1990 mayor's race in Cordova where Margy Johnson won by a single vote – but whose margin of victory rose to two after a recount.

The Arctic as research questions

By Anne Millbrooke

The National Academies Press has just released a new book on The Arctic in the Anthroposcene — in the human scene.

"The Arctic itself is unique," the authors explain. "The seasonal shifts from icy white in winter to browns, greens, and blues in summer are more extreme than anywhere else on Earth as the snow melts on land and the sea ice retreats in the ocean."

Furthermore, the climate is indeed warming, and various national Exclusive Economic Zones cover more of the Arctic Ocean than any other ocean. These pose current challenges for the populations of the north.

A key question is whether Arctic communities will have greater or lesser influence on their futures given the changing ecosystems, increasing urbanization of even Arctic communities, and economic development of the Arctic's resources, including extraction of minerals and

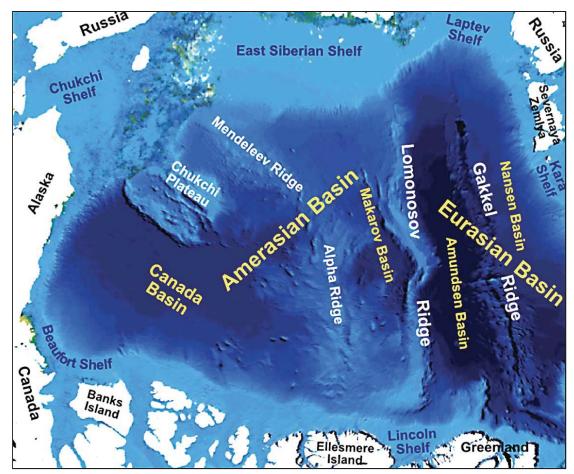

The observed impacts of climate change in the Arctic are numerous, including decreasing sea ice cover in the summer, reduction of ice volume in glaciers, widespread permafrost degradation, increased river discharge for large circumpolar rivers, increased winter minimum river flow, increased lake water temperatures, disappearance of thermokarst lakes, increased shrub cover in the tundra, advance of the Arctic tree line in both latitude and altitude, changing breeding areas and population size of subarctic birds, loss of snowbed ecosystems and tussock tundra, increased coastal erosion, decreased reproductive success of nonspecies, decreased migratory reproductive success of seabirds, increased shipping traffic across the Bering Strait, ocean acidification, and increased accessibility and economic activity in resource exploration, shipping, and tourism.

The authors address astronomical, cryosphereic, biological, cultural, and political questions in a time of rapid change in the Arctic, and also the Arctic's role in the global cli-

"Once ice-bound, difficult to access, and largely ignored by the rest of the world—literally off the map in some projections—the Arctic is now front and center in the midst of many important questions facing the world today," according to the authors, who try to define and prioritize research questions about the Arctic.

The Arctic in the Anthroposcene: Emerging Research Questions, by the Committee on Emerging Research Question in the Arctic, Polar Research Board, Division on Earth and Life Studies, National Research Council (Washington, DC: National Academies Press, 2014) is available as a free PDF ebook downloadable the press's http://www.nap.edu/.

There's no forms to fill out, no balances to keep track of, no running to school because you forgot the lunch money, or worrying about your child eating a nutritional breakfast. It's free and available every morning and lunchtime. The meals are free everyday to all students that want to take advantage of the program. A combination of Grants, new Food Service Management, and the hard work of our business department have created this opportunity for all students in Nome Public Schools to have two meals a day at no cost. This is also the first time that NPS is

We hope you are as excited about this as we are. Research has proven over and over again that a great breakfast each morning helps students in countless ways. We at Nome Public Schools believe this will truly benefit our kids. To accommodate the new breakfast program, a few minor changes needed to be made in the time of school schedules. However, morning busses will continue to run at the same time as last year. All classes in all buildings will start 10 minutes later and dismiss 10 minutes later than last year. Please consult the NPS back to school page for start times at all campuses.

The Elementary school was built with NO ASBESTOS products and this remains to be the case.

Nome Beltz was built using Asbestos Products and over the years a majority of it has been removed and or encapsulated. We had an independent contractor do our required 3 Year re-inspection and he found all remaining Asbestos to be well maintained and in no danger of release. We will continue to do our in-house inspection every 6 months but again anticipate no problems. There is a copy of the inspection report maintained at the District Office available for review by the public

SB21: A Bad Deal for Alaska

By Barbara and Hal Gazaway In the oil revenue debate we've heard and read misleading statements and distorted facts. As longtime Alaska residents, business owners, and grandparents, we are very concerned about Alaska's future economy. The "Vote No on Proposition One" group paints an "almost too good to be true" picture if SB21 prevails in August. The group repeatedly alludes to Alaska's partnership with the oil companies, assuring us that this new deal (SB21) will result in more jobs as well as economic Although this paints a rosy picture, it also raises questions. Does this partnership have Alaska's best interests in their long range planning? Will this "partnership" with Alaska develop a plan for future sustainable, safe energy for Alaskans? How can Alaska's government, mandated by its Constitution to develop its resources for the maximum benefit of Alaskans, partner with corporations, mandated to provide profits for their shareholders? Do they share revenue information with Alaska? Can we rely on the oil companies for a good deal?

In the past, foreign corporations exploited Alaska's rich natural wealth with projects that harvested Alaska's wealth but left little for Alaska. The Kennecott Copper Mine is one example. Alaska's past "boom and bust" economy resulted in resource extraction solely for exploitation and profit with no concern for permanent growth and development. That remains the same today.

The state now faces huge deficits if we continue to sell our oil to multinational corporations at bargain prices. Alaska, under SB21, receives less revenue than other owner states. The glossy ads, paid by the oil corporations, fail to compare their share of the profit in Iraq or Mexico to their share of the profit from Alaska's oil. These multinational corporations, along with their CEOs, investors and stockholders, have been the beneficiaries of Alaska's oil for many decades.

At a recent Chamber of Commerce debate, oil and gas attorney, Craig Richards, pointed out the decline in pipeline throughput of oil characterizes aging fields. The solution lies in new production, exploring and developing new fields and pools in existing fields. Reports show Alaska has substantially more oil in the ground and will be able to produce for years to come Alaska's Clear and Equitable Share encourages this kind of development. SB 21 rewards increasing the rate of extraction from the old, declining fields. Mr. Richards pointed out much of last year's increased activity required long range planning. Oil rigs had already been bought and shipped to Alaska under ACÉS.

"Vote No" says we want to go back to a flawed law. Darn right we do. We want to make a good law better and return to a law (ACES) from which Alaska received $8.5 billion more than it would have under

As business owners, we want audits of the state's oil revenues and unbiased research made available to our elected citizen representatives. Our legislators require accurate, up to date accountability to make informed decisions. As an owner-state Alaska needs that information.

Alaskans must take a principled stand no matter our political affiliation. We will not have a democratic, citizen-represented government if we continue to allow multinationals to dominate our government, our laws, our policies, and our elec-

"Whenever the people are well informed, they can be trusted with their own government; that whenever things get so far wrong as to attract their notice, they may be relied on to set them to rights."~ Thomas Jefferson 1788

The repeal of SB21 will put Alaskans on the path to "setting things right". We can empower our legislators to represent the resource owners, not the oil companies. In the August 19th Primary election, we will use the strongest voice we have. Thirteen million dollars have already been spent to sway your vote. Please make your decision based on fact, not money-fueled ads, glossy fliers, and glitzy infomercials. Vote Yes on Proposition One for Alaska's long term best interests.

Hal Gazaway attended grade school in the territory of Alaska and high school in the state of Alaska. The first ten dollars he made each year paid a school tax. After nine years as an Assistant Attorney General and Administrative Law Judge, he went into his own law practice in Anchorage.

Barbara Gazaway had a long career in education, teaching music at all levels elementary through University. She taught in the European DOD schools, Pennsylvania, Utah, California, and Alaska. She now teaches piano and works part time as a legal assistant.

ence your vote. Your individual vote! For them, it's not about what's good for you or for your family or for your community or for the future well being of your family or community. What's it about? Corporate profits, which may trickle down to you and to your family or to your community. Or not!

Let's consider the so-called Union ads for No on One. The ads state: Alaska's Unions support No on One. Alaska's Unions, minus the 3 or 4 Fairbanks locals, do not support that vote. The other Unions have been sending out messages to their members supporting a Yes vote on One. Those No ads are, and I'm sure you're paying attention, are sponsored and paid for by the oil companies. Every single one. Look at the bottom of your TV screen.

Have you seen any big spendy ads from any union? From the Central Labor Council? From any other local unions? No. Well, why not? They're doing their work on behalf of their members at the local level. They're not buying/spending members' money on flashy ads. That would be wrong! But that doesn't mean they're not working with and for their members and others on the Vote Yes on One. They're not allowing a few Fairbanks locals to represent all of Alaska's unions!

What else is being paid for by Big Oil and the Corporations? How about those bumper stickers stating "Protect you PFD. Vote NO!" That's just hogwash or something smelling worse than a corporate pig

Your PFD is dependent on a fiveyear average of earnings. That's it. Your PFD amount has nothing to do with the vote on Ballot Measure One! Nothing. This year's PFD is likely to be twice the amount as last year's. Why? It's not because of SB 21; it's because of the five-year average. This year, our PFDs will be larger/higher because the negative earnings in real estate investments by the PF board are no longer considered in the five year average. Simple as that. So, don't fall for those "Protect your PFD. Vote NO!" bumper stickers and messages. They're just trying to get the traditional, emotional PFD support rise out of you. Don't fall for it!

Big Oil would have you believe that they've incredibly increased exploration and exploitation of their leases since the passage of SB 21. Think about that for more than a minute. Common sense will tell you that's just not possible! These "new plans" are not new; they've been in the process for at least 20 years. A company doesn't just decide, because of a new law giving it lots of $$$$, incentive that can/would/could bring forth more oil and gas to fuel the world and the USA in a few months and then get all the necessary infrastructure in place to do that in a few months. Who are they trying to kid?

One has to ask, "Where's the plan to fuel Alaska?" We're the Owner State, after all. We're the ones who pay the highest fuel prices in the nation. What's the deal here?

Let the corporations and Big Oil control your future? Or take a stand as citizen owners of our resources and vote YES on Ballot Measure One!

Sincerely, Jana Varrati Nome, AK 99762

To the Editor,

I was born in 1927 in Haycock, Alaska on the Seward Peninsula and have personally known many good Alaska governors- Egan, Hickel, and Hammond. The current governor is not one we can trust.

What are the true motives of the oil lobbyist Gov. Parnell and those in the legislature who want to give away our money to the poor oil corporations?

As a Doyon member I do not support the Doyon advertising that is being done without approval of the average shareholder.

Alaska oil production is diminishing only because they are keeping it safely locked away for their rainy day account.

Does anyone sincerely believe Alaska is running out of oil? Does anyone sincerely believe we will get anything in return from our politicians' generosity to the big oil corporations with the income from our oil? Do you remember the promise of inexpensive energy for Alaskans from the North Slope? How did the oil corporations come through on that promise?

Big oil corporations have paid for the best representation money can buy, and it is obvious whom many of our elected officials in Juneau really represent. It is up to us, and only us, to step the insanity of the oil corporations controlling our legislature. Please join me in supporting "Vote Repeal the giveaway and be sure in the next election not to vote for those who represent oil corporations instead of Alaskans.

Dear Nancy and all Nomeites!

What a wonderful warm send-off we had from Nome. We want to thank everyone for all the help they gave for the packing, the goodbyes, and the memories of good times of the past. We especially want to thank: the people of St. Joseph parish, Pioneers of Alaska, XYZ senior center, and especially the Rotary Club for the Citizens of the Year award. Several people brought us dinner, already made, when we were packing the last few days. What a thoughtful service that was-we really appreciated it! from the building of the pipeline Many people carried boxes of our belongings as their "baggage" — we had to ship very little by air cargo.

I worked for the State of Alaska Anchorage Airport eight years. A co-worker got a sexual harassment deal going against the airport director. I got it in the news, radio and TV. I turned it in to EEOC as we had 9 cases of human right violations there at the airport. I wrote up a number of EEO reports for the minorities. I mailed the two newspaper articles to the Alaska Legislature and hundreds of names listed in the state book. I also mailed hundreds more to all the airlines and aviation safety organizations. I mailed one to the airport director telling him what I did and said that I was trying to help him so he could do his job better, that we need to get everyone everywhere to work on this problem as a team. I got fired and given a lifetime ban from state employment for making a false statement. DOT refused to say what the false statement was or the name of the person I gave the false statement to as fast as they can on the investigation. As it turns out, state employees never win against the state management on human rights cases. I joined the NAACP and they picked up my case to Lt. Gov. and now Governor Parnell. We have given him hundreds of pages of human right violations. He has had the paperwork for eight years now. Last year I went to Governor Parnell's Choose Respect march last year in Palmer. I asked the governor how many more years does he need to get back with us on the Choose Respect case that I was fired for. He said I will get back with you on the number of years I need to get back with you. That was last year and we still haven't heard from

I sent Governor Palin the newspaper articles. A couple of days later the airport director was sent packing.

This year I wore a pink T-shirt and purple hat saying Captain Zero for Governor at the governor's picnic. His staff told me that I spelled Zorro wrong. I said, well, with all of your cut backs in education, I did the best I could. So where is the governor on action for Choose Respect? He is a no show.

Dear Editor,

"The hurry-up and wait genera-

"When complacency, apathy and me-ism, overrun any government, that government is doomed to eventual failure, in my opinion!"

And when the people silently accept a government, anywhere in the world, that relies more upon bluster, excuses, and sidestepping problems, than in even attempting to get something of a positive and constructive nature done, then that group of individuals has become part of the overall problem! In fact, far too many these days are afraid to even speak their minds, but rather silently grumble under their breath over that which they know is wrong, and this is a recipe for disaster!

When any group of people begin to consider their opinions to be politically incorrect, or even downright offensive to certain vested powers that be, and this merely because some political power broker tells them that they are pushing the wrong envelope, then that society has all but given up on what a democracy is really all about! As a matter of fact, for far too many in power these days there are but two ways of seeing things – their way and the unacceptable way. And to compound the problem even further, the most straightforward political tasks are now greeted, not with alacrity, but rather with foot-dragging and buckpassing!

Saying It Sincerely

Rev. Karen L. Sonray Our Savior Lutheran Church, member Nome Ministerial Assoc.

"...All ate and they were satisfied." Matthew 14: 20

Over the past three weeks at Salmon Lake Bible Camp over 100 campers and staff have been fed breakfast, lunch and dinner with home-made meals ranging from salmon and caribou soup to peanut butter sandwiches and sloppy joes.

We really didn't run into any major problems – even the day we ran out of propane! The pancakes had been flipped already that morning. The question was more about lunch. Would we have propane by lunchtime to cook the caribou soup? Instead of having soup for lunch and ham for dinner, the cooks switched up the menu: ham sandwiches taken with us on and hike for lunch and hot caribou soup for dinner. All was well!

The situation is quite different in the biblical story often referred to as "the Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," found in each of the Gospels. Five thousand people who have followed Jesus, are still with him in a "deserted place" late that day and they are hungry. Jesus tells his disciples not to send them away to the villages to get food but to feed them right there!

Today in our world there are still many people who go hungry and find themselves in a "deserted place." Just as in Jesus' day, many people often go hungry not due to a shortage of food, but due to the unfair distribution of food and due to the corruption of those who control that distribution.

Jesus' way of leadership contrasts that of the Roman Empire leaders. He has compassion. It is God's will that people are fed. This is a repeating theme in the biblical tradition that speaks up for hospitality to strangers, sharing of food and condemns unjust policies or hoarding.

Jesus enacts God's will that hungry people be fed.

He endorses the merciful practice of alms giving that redistributes resources to those in need (Matthew 6:4); defends the practice of procuring food even on the Sabbath (Matthew 12: 1-8) and declares that nations will be judged in part on how they cared for the hungry (Matthew 25: 32-42)

This summer, don't forget the Food Bank. Also think about storing up food to share and make soups for NEST later this winter. Share of your abundance to those who do not have a hunter or picker. And call your legislator or write a letter encouraging fair policies for the under-served. In so doing, you will be assuring Jesus' miracle of feeding the 5,000 continues today through people like you.

Obituary

Amos Thompson January 4, 1990 – July 6, 2014 Loyal Friend, Brother, Son

Amos Thompson died suddenly on Sunday, July 6 at the age of 24. For years he struggled with a mental illness with no relief. He had many friends and family but felt alone. Many who knew him are suffering. He was a unique young man that will be greatly missed. He is now in God's hands and free from the struggles of his earthly mind.

He looked up to many, and down on no one. Even through all his struggles, his heart never changed. His kind eyes and bright smile warmed many hearts. He would look out for those who struggled. He lived without judgment, but he wasn't afraid of speaking his mind. He'd tell you the truth: "you look nice today", "that makeup's clogging your pores", "sit up straight", "you have a sexy voice", "stay beautiful."

Amos was born in Delta Junction, Alaska in a cold cabin on January 4, 1990. He was the second oldest child of four children. Amos is survived by his parents Roger and Cheryl Thompson, sister Talitha, brothers Isaac and Noah Thompson, grandmothers Joyce Thompson and June Nelson, along with his close friends he considered family.

Amos will always be remembered for his courage during difficult times. His perspective on life was different from most. He lived for adventure and had a way of seeing the light even through the darkness. He loved his family and all of his many, many friends. Fascinated with his name, he would sign it on any surface. He took pride in his many accomplishments. At 11 years old he was featured in Alaska Magazine, "Boy Bags Bear", for harvesting the largest bear on the Seward Peninsula. He enjoyed spending time with his brothers, taking his red snowmachine out in the winters and hunting when he was younger. He always looked out for his siblings.

He worked for his father, Roger, learning many talents. He also helped his mother with an aquarium business and gardening. Last summer he learned to mine gold with friends.

He didn't like to be alone and enjoyed the time he spent with all of us. He had a passion for life. He loved to watch gardens grow, (he takes after Mom with that). As a young boy he built his own club house, even added on a mini attachment for his little brother. He lived a life of color. He was a great swimmer and loved the tropics, the hot sun, the water, the fruity drinks, the fresh food, the happy smiles. And of course his love for bright neons!

The service for Amos Thompson will be held on Saturday, August 9. His burial at the Nome Cemetery will be held first at 2 p.m. followed by a potluck at Old St.Joe's on Anvil City Square at 3 p.m.

pressed White with the intimate knowledge of snow and ice that is so unique to traditional knowledge.

"He told me on St. Lawrence Island, they have more than a hundred words for snow and ice," White said.

He joked that, while Nome sees sleek sled dogs strut into Nome during Iditarod time, it sees a different kind of dog anchored at the West

He alluded to the ship's nickname, called the "Bulldog of the Bering."

"You have a stout bulldog here today, to protect and serve," he said. The Alex Haley is a 282-foot medium endurance cutter homeported in Kodiak.

Its crew is charged with patrolling Alaskan waters, the Arctic and North Pacific Ocean ensuring the safety and security of mariners and Alaskans. The crew's primary missions are homeland security, search and rescue and law enforcement.

While in Nome, the crew opens their ship to tours for Nomeites on Tuesday and Wednesday from 3 p.m. to 7 p.m.

The cutter is scheduled to leave Nome on Thursday.

Geothermal power project underway at Pilgrim Hot Springs

By Sandra L. Medearis

Crews are looking to get into hot water at Pilgrim Hot Springs as they continue developmental drilling to isolate a source of geothermal energy to provide heat and light to Nome utility ratepayers.

Nome Joint Utility System has signed a contract with Pilgrim Geothermal to buy up to two megawatts at 25 cents per kilowatt when and if the facility comes on line.

According to John K. Handeland, utility manager, the project has hit a temporary delay while the drilling team brings down another drill from Black Hawk Drilling in Fairbanks.

Handeland quoted Howard Trott, Pilgrim Geothermal president, as saying the next drill would be able to start right up without having to build a pad and will cause little disturbance to the site 37 miles from

"We expect they will have a team assembled and be going full steam ahead by the end of the month,' Handeland said Monday.

Dear Editor:

13 Million Dollars Buys a Lot of Fear

Fear is one of the basest, most reptilian emotions. We all know this, but it still can be a huge barrier to doing our duty, or acting in our own defense. Our enemies know this. Even advertising agencies know this. And they use it. Every time the oil industry wants something we have, they threaten us with the fear losing our jobs, our security, and our prosperity.

It is no different now with Proposition 1. Employees are told that if they don't vote Proposition 1 down, they'll lose everything they need: job, home, life in Alaska.

Franklin D. Roosevelt led America by telling us, "We have nothing to fear, but fear itself." And that was during the Great Depression, when things were really fearful. They remain some of the wisest words ever spoken by an American. They are wise for us in Alaska now.

For six years, the ACES oil revenue system worked, wasn't broken, and gave us prosperity. Now we're falsely told it was broken, and needed changes. If it needed any changes, why not change it? Why a whole new law?

Because the Oil big three, Exxon, Conoco-Phillips and BP all wanted to maximize their profit in Alaska. It is the only thing that changed for them! We don't get a better deal, we don't get assurance they'll produce more oil, and all the people get are threats and fear mongering.

The vote to repeal SB 21 was brought about by brave people who did what the Alaska Constitution enables them to do. When they see something very wrong, they can petition for repeal of a bad law. 51,000 of your fellow Alaskans did that, and now you have a chance as a voter to do it too: on August 19 or sooner. But the Oil industry wants you to be very afraid. They make us fear for our jobs, our schools, our future, just so they can make more profit. They've cheated us before (Amerada

Vote "Yes" for Good Stewardship

Alaska's oil belongs to the people of Alaska. It is a non-renewable commodity. It has value, but when it is gone, it is gone. Our elected state officials have a responsibility to be judicious in the stewardship of our oil. The State of Alaska must not be hoodwinked into selling us short. We can't let that happen.

As citizens of Alaska we are at the mercy of our elected officials who should not be acting as pawns of the oil companies and governmental versions of a used car salesman. The fear tactics, the mantra of jobs, jobs, jobs, and embellishment of truth are claims we have to debunk. We need to be informed consumers and citizens who take the responsibility of citizenship seriously. We need to protect our resources for future generations and be good stewards of our oil and gas.

We must not allow unscrupulous politicians to give away the store. It's our oil and we should not sell it cheap. We must not give it away. SB 21 undervalues our oil resource. We should make money on the sale of oil not act like a bunch of bumpkins who don't understand the value of what we own. Even former Governor Palin agrees that we need to get rid of SB 21. So, vote "Yes" this coming Tuesday and ditch SB 21. - N.L.M.-

Coast Guard on research cruise in the Arctic

For a second year, members of the Coast Guard Research and Development Center of New London, Connecticut, make their way to the Arctic Ocean to conduct research and test new equipment and technologies. They aim to expand their knowledge and ability to respond to potential hazards and emergencies brought on by increased vessel traffic through the region.

It's a big mission. RDC members departed from Seward for the Arctic, on August 8, aboard the Coast Guard Cutter Healy, a 420-foot icebreaker home-ported in Seattle, Washington.

The Healy's crew knows its way around, and sometimes through, the ever-shifting ice floes of the north. Along for the journey are researchers from 14 agencies and universities including the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, US NORTHCOM, U.S. Space and Naval Warfare Systems Comman, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers Cold Region Research and Engineering Laboratory and University of Cam-

"Our approach has always been to partner with other agencies to bring together people and technologies for Coast Guard mission improvement," said Rich Hansen, RDC Chief Scientist. "Each of the RDC's partners brings its own expertise and ideas and contributes to our overall mission success."

Among those participating in the RDC's Arctic mission for the first time is the Department of Homeland Security's Science, Technology Engineering and Mathematics program intern, an internship designed to complement the studies of students pursuing careers in STEM-related fields. Extending an offer to include a DHS STEM intern not only gives the student a chance to work alongside professional researchers, but it can also offer the mission a fresh perspective.

"I aspire to become a research scientist in the field of renewable energy," said Anton Yanchilin, the DHS STEM intern aboard the Healy who is attending Creighton University. "This is a very unique opportunity for me, and I look forward to my first-hand experience in the Arctic Circle and working with unmanned technologies during this summer's deployment."

The RDC members and their partners will test and study a wide range of technologies during their trip to the Arctic including unmanned aerial and submersible vehicles, information management systems, and tracking buoys, which can be used to monitor chemical spills. These devices could prove invaluable to future research or in the event of a maritime disaster on Alaska's north coast.

"One of our goals as part of Arctic Shield 2014 is to broaden the Coast Guard's partnerships with Alaskan communities, especially along the North Slope," said Hansen. "With that in mind, the RDC coordinated with Alaska's state government and tribal communities and invited representatives to travel with us and observe our research." A member of the State of Alaska's Department of Environmental Conservation is riding with the team.

As Arctic ice recedes, the Coast Guard's area of responsibility expands. New avenues for maritime traffic will bring new challenges, but what the RDC and its partners discover during their summer sojourn may better prepare them for what lies ahead.

"Our goal is to help the Coast Guard identify new technologies and discover better ways to perform in the extreme environment of the Arctic," Hansen said. "That's a goal we'll only reach by sharing knowledge and working together.'

The Healy arrived in Nome on August 12.

RESEARCH—Mike Coleman, an engineer from the Coast Guard Research and Development Center in New London, Conn., examines a tracking buoy aboard the Coast Guard Cutter Healy in Seward, Alaska, Aug. 7, 2014. Researchers from the RDC, along with scientists, technicians and engineers from 14 other agencies will travel to the Arctic Circle to conduct studies as part of Arctic Shield 2014, an initiative to improve the Coast Guard's understanding and stewardship of U.S. Arctic waters.

Moreland appointed to Pacific Salmon Commission

The U.S. Department of State has confirmed Governor Sean Parnell's nomination of Stefanie Moreland as Alaska's representative to the Pacific Salmon Commission.

Moreland was recently appointed deputy commissioner of the Alaska Department of Fish and Game. She previously served as a special assistant for fish, wildlife, ocean and Arctic policy in the office of the Governor, as a fisheries staffer for Senator Lisa Murkowski and as an economist for both ADF&G and the Commercial Fisheries Entry Commission.

Moreland fills a vacancy created by the retirement of long-serving Pacific Salmon Commissioner David Bedford.

The Pacific Salmon Commission implements the treaty between Canada and the United States that provides for the international conservation and harvest sharing of Pacific salmon. The Pacific Salmon Treaty is of critical importance to Southeast Alaska commercial salmon fishermen, sport anglers, and support industries. ADF&G commits substantial capacity to effectively engage in the Pacific Salmon Commission process.

"In her new role, Stefanie joins the exceptional and dedicated group of fisheries biologists and industry representatives who protect Alaska's interests in the Pacific Salmon Commission process," said Governor Parnell. "In addition to her Pacific Salmon Commission duties, Stefanie will retain her role as lead for the administration on Arctic and ocean policy, and continue to be part of the team providing me with policy advice on fish and game issues."

The governor's recent appointment of Ben Mohr – a former Pebble Partnership spokesperson - to serve as a special assistant was ill received by the Alaskan press and public. In a press release, the governor said Mohr's focus will be on outreach to constituents and coordinating across departments on issues such as land access. He will add capacity to the team that includes ADF&G Commissioner Cora Campbell, Deputy Commissioner Moreland, and other senior department and Governor's Office staff to advise on fisheries, wildlife and land access matters.

Arctic ice predicted to recede fast

According to the publication "Maritime Executive," sea ice is going to recede faster than last summer, opening the Northern Sea Route one month earlier than last year. The paper quotes the Global Ice Center at Weathernews Inc. Based on trends observed so far this year, the ice has been receding at a pace consistent with previous years. Experts at the Global Ice Center expect this summer's minimum ice extent to be less than last summer. Weathernews is confident that the Northern Sea Route will open in August both on the northeastern passage on the Russian side and northwestern passage along Canada, making the route fully accessible to commercial shipping traffic approximately one month earlier than last year.

Use of the NSR by the shipping and energy industries has increased annually. The need for detailed information on ice conditions is increasing, too. The Japan-based company Weathernews provides nowcasts and forecasts to companies operating voyages through the NSR.

Ice in the Arctic Sea started to melt this year in late May and continues to recede at the same pace seen in the last few years. Currently, the total area of ice coverage is approximately 2.8 million square Ice continues to melt in the Laptev Sea, which is already mostly open water. However, wide areas of ice still remain in the East Siberian Sea and the Kara Sea.

On the Canadian side, there is also sea ice remaining in the Barrow Strait and even a few places within the Canadian archipelago.

Weathernews predicts that melting will speed up, heading into the peak of the summer season. Ice coverage in September could be even less than last summer.

There is also a slight possibility the minimum ice extent may not reach or exceed the lowest ever recorded surface area seen in 2012.

With the expectation that the northeastern passage bordering Russian will open in mid-August, and the northwestern passage on the Canadian side will follow soon after, the Weathernews forecasts the NSR will be open almost a full month earlier. GIC simulation models show the route starting to close again in early-October, leaving the route open for about six weeks for ships to sail through the Arctic sea while avoiding areas of concentrated sea ice. The Maritime Executive reports that the Northern Sea Route Administration in Russia received applications from over 400 vessels to sail through the northeastern passage of the NSR as of July 22. The global shipping industry is actively adopting the NSR as an alternative route to longer and more costly routes via canals or around the tip of South Africa. The publication says that there are about 30 voyages sailing through the Artic Sea. Due to the risks involved with vessels sailing via the NSR, the need for detailed information on ice conditions has been increasing along with shipping traf-

BSEE selects tribal liaison

The Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement has selected Jack Lorrigan as its Tribal and Community Liaison within the Alaska Region to work with Alaska's Native organizations, Tribal Governments, coastal communities and community based organizations.

Lorrigan's hiring launches a new era of enhanced communication and coordination.

Lorrigan will be responsible for developing a communications strategy with Alaska Tribal Governments and communities affected by offshore energy development. His duties will include maintaining regular contact with appropriate leaders in Alaska's Native organizations, Tribal Governments, CBOs, and communities, keeping them apprised of general offshore activities, and facilitating communication with BSEE leadership. Other responsibilities will include maintaining awareness of issues involving the Alaska Native organizations, Tribal Governments, CBOs, and communities that may impact offshore operations and ensuring the Region Director and staff is aware of these issues.

In addition, Lorrigan will develop opportunities within the Alaska Region for students from the Alaska Native Science and Engineering Program (ANSEP) on the University of Alaska Anchorage campus.

ANSEP specializes in providing advanced science and engineering programs to underserved village youth.

Lorrigan is originally from Sitka. He is a tribal member of the Sitka Tribe of Alaska and was the tribal biologist for nearly 10 years. He received his B.S. in Aquatic Sciences from Sheldon Jackson College, in Sitka. Lorrigan has worked with the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, the Environmental Protection Agency, the United States Forrest Service, private non-profit hatchery organizations and most recently the United States Fish and Wildlife Service.

Beautiful summer weather, warm temperatures and a slight breeze was the story of last week. Nome Harbormaster Lucas Stotts reports the following activity at the Nome Small Boat harbor and the Port of Nome:

On August 5, Delta Western's vessels Capt. Frank Moody and the barge OB5 arrived for repairs.

On August 6, Orion Marine's tug boat Millie Cruz arrived for repairs. The Capt. Frank Moody departed.

The sailboat S/V Philos arrived from Southeast Alaska. It prepares for a voyage through the Northwest Passage.

On August 7, the USCG Cutter Alex Haley departed and headed

On August 8, Vitus Marine's fuel tug Naniq arrived to deliver fuel. They departed that evening.

On August 9, there was no activity reported.

On August 10, Alaska Logistics tug and barge Fish Hawk arrived to drop off cargo. It departed the next

On August 12, the USCG icebreaker Healy arrived in Nome's roadstead and is scheduled to depart on August 13.

Canadian dam break could threaten SE Alaska fisheries

APRN reports that a tailings-dam break similar to last week's break of a British Columbia copper and gold mine could threaten Southeast Alaska salmon fisheries.

Ed Schoenfeld with Coast Alaska reports that similar dams closer to the border could be polluting Alaska waters. Last week's break happened 400 miles south of Ketchikan, at the Mount Polley gold and copper mine near Likely, BC.

Observers estimate enough water, mud and rock to fill 2,000 Olympic-sized swimming pools es-

Emergency officials warned downstream residents against drinking from affected waterways.

That includes salmon-rich tributaries of the Fraser River, which empties into the Pacific Ocean at Vancouver, B.C.

A half-dozen similar mines are planned for northwest British Columbia, closer to the Alaska border.

Plans to store tailings, which contain acidic rock and toxic metals. behind dams are similar to the one that broke last week.

The Mount Polley break may have been caused by heavy rainfall and increased production added pressure to the dam.

The Mount Polley mine owner, Vancouver-based Imperial Metals, plans to open the Red Chris Mine, in the Stikine River watershed this

Like Mount Polley and KSM, it's an open-pit copper and gold mine.

CDAR.

The 2014 open access summer red king crab fishery closed at noon on August 2. The harvest was 360,853 pounds of male red king crab by 33 vessels. The harvest was 6,763 pounds over the guideline harvest level of 354,090.

As of Friday there was 6,996 pounds left on CDQ quota of 28,710 pounds. Eighteen permit holders signed up for CDQ with a rush of 16 permit holders signing up once the closure of the open access crab fishery was announced.

SALMON:

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon catches this season are: 280 kings, 98,000 chums, 180,000 pinks, 300 reds and 38,000 silvers by 80 permit holders. The silver salmon forecast range for the commercial fishery is a harvest of 60,000 to 90,000 fish and projections show that this should easily be reached and may be exceeded.

The tower crew was unable to count for 12 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26 with half-day counts and full day counts beginning on July 29. Cumulative counts through August 8 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,300 kings, 10,600 chums, 144,000 pinks and 1,100 silvers. The average historical midpoint of the silver run past the tower has been August 15.

Cumulative counts through August 8 should be considered minimal for all species and were 1,000 kings, 48,000 chums, 1.2 million pinks, 185 reds and 12,000 silvers. There are only two previous years when counting continued past the first week of August and this year's silver count is ahead of both years.

There have been 259 Pilgrim River subsistence salmon permits issued this season; the second highest number in the 51 years permits have been required. Last year 265 permits were issued.

Kotzebue

The 2014 Kotzebue commercial salmon fishery continues to roll along with the catch now over 431,000 chum salmon by 70 permit holders and ranks fifth greatest all-time. For the first time since 1988 that the inseason payouts to fishermen have exceeded one million dollars.

Kobuk River Test Fish - Fish & Game project.

The test fishing chum salmon catch index is still soaring. It looked like catches were starting to slow on the 7th but then picked back up on the 8th. This year was the greatest chum catch index in the 22-year project history. The last day of test fishing will be August 13.

COAST GUARD IN TOWN—Besides the USCG Cutter Alex Haley, a team from Sector Anchorage, 17th District Juneau and Station Valdez were in Nome to perform several missions, including conducting dockside exams and boardings.

Coast Guard still conducting boardings in Nome

Coast Guard sector Anchorage and station Valdez personnel are still in Nome conducting at-sea boardings of recreational and fishing vessels in the area since July 30, 2014.

The eight-person crew and 25-foot Response Boat – Small deployed to Nome via Coast Guard Air Station Kodiak HC-130 Hercules airplane and continue to conduct boardings of recreational and fishing vessels as part of Operation Gold Nugget, an offshoot of Arctic Shield 2014.

The crew consists of four personnel from Station Valdez, who are trained to operate the response vessel and four law enforcement personnel from Sector Anchorage's enforcement department, who are trained to conduct law enforcement boardings and check for safety and environmental violations on vessels.

"One focus of Operation Gold Nugget is the abundance of gold dredge vessels operating in Nome," said Cmdr. Decker, chief of response, Sector Anchorage. "Our crews are there to make sure that all the mariners involved in that enterprise are operating safely."

Categorized as recreational vessels, the floating gold dredges are required to conform to federal regulations that the Coast Guard enforces.

To date, they boarded 52 vessels, including three commercial fishing vessels, four recreational vessels and 45 gold dredges.

The dockside examiners conducted 13 exams and issued eight decals on their trip from July 9 to 16. The more recent trip, from Aug. 1-8, resulted in 23 exams with 17 decals issued and another five commercial fishing vessel exams with five de-

APRN to continue for three more months on KUAC

On August 7, KUAC and Alaska Public Media have reached an agreement that will allow KUAC to continue broadcasting APRN programming for an additional three months past the announced end date of Aug. 31.

The extension will give KUAC and APRN time to continue discussions aimed at finding a way for KUAC to continue broadcasting the statewide news programs. If a solution can be found, KUAC intends to pay the APRN membership in full.

"KUAC values APRN programming and we are very appreciative of the step taken by APRN as we work our way through some very trying times," said KUAC general manager, Keith Martin.

Steve Lindbeck, CEO and general manager of Alaska Public Media, parent company of APRN stated, "We understand the difficulties KUAC faces in reconciling tough university budget cuts, and KUAC isn't the first APRN member station to face a hardship. APRN will suspend KUAC dues payments for three months to give time for other options to be considered."

KUAC leaders will continue to look for long-term solutions that minimize the effects of leaner budgets on listeners and viewers.

KUAC airs three products from APRN: Alaska News Nightly each weekday evening from 6-6:30 p.m.; Talk of Alaska on Tuesdays at 10 a.m., and a 3-minute morning newscast, twice during Morning Edition.

The cut to KUAC's general fund allocation could have been much worse, a press release on KUAC's website states. The initial recommendation from UAF's Planning and Budget Committee was to completely zero-out funding to KUAC. KUAC is fortunate to have such strong support and advocacy from Chancellor Brian Rogers, Vice Chancellor Mike Sfraga, and thousands of dedicated supporters in our community.

The amount of cut that KUAC is experiencing is beyond the reported $100,000 to the general fund allocation. The amount of the budget reduction is actually $170,000.

This amount includes the recommended and approved $100,000 reduction, plus an across-the-board 5% pull-back the entire UAF campus is experiencing, and an additional .5% pull-back departments within the University and Student Advancement Division of UAF are experiencing. This reduction amount is only for FY15 (July 1, 2014-June 30, 2015).

It is unknown how much of a budget cut KUAC will experience in subsequent years, however, it is anticipated that additional cuts will occur.

With the initial $100,000 general fund reduction, KUAC was directed to raise an additional $100,000 for FY15, prior to the budget reductions.

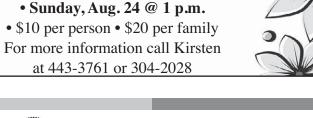

All told, KUAC starts out FY15 with a deficit of $270,000.

After investigating all options, making several budget adjustments and reductions, KUAC management said, it is making tough decisions with regard to operations and staffing so that it can minimize the impact to viewers and listeners.

CHECKING—Coast Guard Sector Anchorage enforcement department personnel conduct a boarding aboard a gold dredge vessel near Nome, Alaska, Aug. 3, 2014. Boardings are conducted to ensure that vessel crews are operating safely and complying with environmental regulations.

• Geothermal

UAF began summer exploration work in 2012 to see if Pilgrim Hot Springs could deliver viable geothermal energy to Nome. The Pilgrim site is 37 miles from Nome,

In 2012, UAF's Alaska Center for Energy and Power received a $4.6 million grant from the federal Dept. of Energy to check into the geothermal resources at the former orphanage operated by a religious organization.

Ownership of the mission site has changed hands and is owned currently by Unaataq, LLC, a consortium of the Alaska Native village corporations of Sitnasuak, White Mountain, Teller and Mary's Igloo, and Kawerak, Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. and the regional Bering Straits Native Corp.

In March, Nome Joint Utility Systems Board and Nome Common Council members voted unanimously at a joint meeting to buy up to two megawatts of geothermal power from Pilgrim Geothermal at 25 cents a kilowatt for 20 years.

According to the agreement, developers will take on the risk and the expense of infrastructure, including building generators at Pilgrim Hot Springs and a 60-mile transmission line to get the juice to town.

The future of the geothermal plant is not clear because the project needs more testing to find the exact source of the hot water to measure temperature and flow rater.

However, Pilgrim Geothermal will not continue testing without NJUS committing to purchase power to justify the expense of farther research.

Additionally, Pilgrim Geothermal needs to get underway with the geothermal project to qualify for investment tax credits available until the end of 2013.

Handeland does not believe that geothermal in the two megawatt range would bring down the current price of electricity, but locking in a fixed 25 cents per kilowatt rate would provide certainty on a portion of NJUS expenses, he said.

Further, if fuel prices do increase, and all indications say that they will, the benefits of geothermal would increase. If fuel prices go down, NJUS has diversified its cost basis.

Under the contract, Pilgrim Geothermal will build and maintain the plant and the transmission line from the plant to the vicinity of Rock Creek Mine.

Terms of the contract call for Pilgrim Geothermal to receive 20 cents per kilowatt. Four cents per kilowatt would go to Unaataq, owners of the hot springs resource. The remaining penny per kilowatt would go to NJUS for use of the utility's existing distribution line from Rock Creek.

PILGRIM HOT SPRINGS— Work continues to test the possibility of developing a geothermal power generating plant at Pilgrim Hot Springs.

A Coast Guard crew picked up three mariners aboard a disabled skiff between Sledge Island and Cripple River, on Tuesday evening. They received a dispatch from the Nome Police Department that a 16foot skiff had engine problems, was disabled and adrift, and that police had lost communications with the mariners. The Alex Haley launched a small boat crew to look for the mariners.

The crew spotted the skiff on shore near Cripple River where the mariners were receiving assistance with their vessel from good Samaritans.

After fixing their skiff, the mariners headed back out but started having engine trouble again. The crew of the Coast Guard's small boat took the skiff in tow and brought them back to the harbor.

"This was a great opportunity to demonstrate the commitment to the safety of the environment and people of Nome," said Cmdr. Steve White, Coast Guard Cutter Alex Haley commanding officer. "It was nice to conduct operations during a port call to build the relationship and partnerships with local leadership and native communities."

A plaque at the door to commanding officer White's door displays his name, rank, the name of the ship -including nickname- and the motto "Find the good and praise it."

Officer Hernandez said the crew consists of about 100 people, who are out at sea for two to three weeks at a time. Before arriving in Nome, they sailed from Kodiak to the Arctic Circle, back to Dutch Harbor, and then to Nome while patrolling the Bering Sea. Asked if the Coast Guard's services are required in case of an emergency, he said it would take about three days at full steam ahead to make it from the ship's home port of Kodiak to Nome. At top speed, the vessel can sail at 18 knots or approximately 20 mph.

On the second deck, the ship's nickname is written on the floor in red, white and blue. "Yes, we're like the bulldog patrolling a fence," Hernandez said.

After four days in Nome, the Alex Haley pulled up its gangplank again and set out to keep patrolling the Bering Sea.

Moroccan man swims from dateline to Little Diomede

By Diana Haecker

Hassan Baraka, a 27-year-old Moroccan swimmer, is on a mission to connect all continents with a symbolic swim. Last week, he checked off number three of his list of five, connecting Asia with North America. Baraka swam from the International dateline near Big Diomede to Little Diomede, a distance of less than a

On August 6, at 7:30 a.m., he dropped into the chilly 42.8°F water, swimming alongside two support boats from the invisible line drawn in the ocean to Little Diomede.

By 8 o'clock it was all over. The swimmer was back on land, with a big grin on his face and rosy cheeks from the cold water.

Swimming or other attempts to cross the Bering Strait by foot, boats, kite boards or other means, often fail because of the harsh, unpredictable and fast changing weather in the region. But for Baraka - whose name translates into "Good luck" -all stars

The young Moroccan and his team had the incredible luck to land in Little Diomede in calm weather, sunshine and smooth waters on Tuesday, August 5. The next day, right on schedule, the man got his support boats in the water, hopped into the frigid seas and swam half-a-mile to the rocky shores of Little Diomede. There, he flashed a smile, proudly held up the Moroccan flag and was done with what his team had deemed the most difficult of the five swims.

In order to prepare for the short swim through the ripping currents and cold waters of the Bering Strait, Baraka took cold showers and planted his face in ice cubes.

His manager, Mounia Bendriss, said while they were in Moscow to apply for visas and permits, Baraka traveled to Lake Baikal in Siberia to practice cold-water swimming. The idea for the series of swims linking continents came to him last year swim across the notorious Strait of Gibraltar from Tarifa, Spain to Tanger, Morocco, linking Africa to

It took him four hours and one minute to cross the 10.3 miles of strong currents and heavy ship traffic to reach Spain. After the crossing the thought was to link the country he was born in to the country he studied in - he conceived of the idea to symbolically link all continents with a swim. He then participated in the Bosporus Cross-Continental swim across the Bosporus from East Istanbul in Europe to West Istanbul in Eurasia. The swim between the dateline and Diomede took care of the Asia-America link.

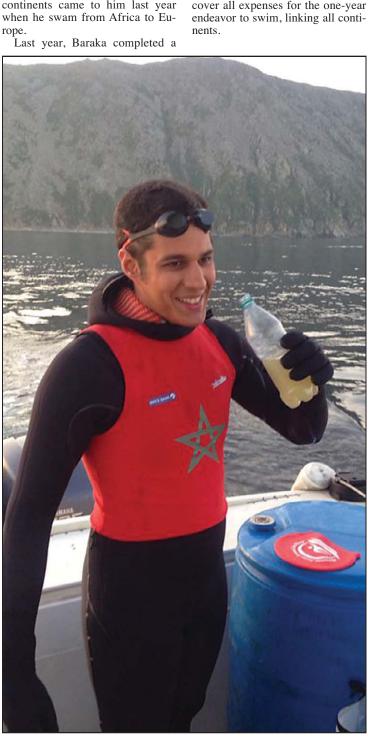

This fall, he plans to swim from Papua New Guinea to Indonesia, basically swimming around a border that cuts the island into two countries, linking Asia to Oceania. Due to political unrests, this portion was postponed to September.

In October, Baraka plans to connect Africa to Asia by swimming across the Gulf of Aqaba, from Egypt to Arabia.

Asked about the intention of his swims, Baraka said while his goal is not political, he would like to spread the message of environmental protection and world peace. In good English with a thick French accent, he went on to say that he wants to show how close all races, all cultures and all people are. Coming from an Arab country, he points out that he'd like to show that not all Arabs are bad, not all Muslims are radical and that stereotypes are counterproduc-

Baraka traveled with a team consisting of his manager Bendriss, a doctor, a coach and a local production manager.

Baraka and his team are primarily sponsored by a bank and a mineral water company. His manager said their budget is roughly $240,000 to cover all expenses for the one-year

Summer Reading program explored world of science

By Rosa SchmidtWith summer coming to a close, the Kegoayah Kozga Library celebrated another successful season of literacy programs. The Library wrapped up the summer reading program that began the last day of school and ended this week with a party for kids from preschool age to eighth grade students who completed the program and turned in their summer reading logs.

This year's Summer Reading Program's theme was "Fizz, Boom, Read!" The older kids came to the library on Thursdays and had the opportunity to participate for the first time in live interactive videoconferences, many of which explored the world of science.

The students enjoyed learning about Alaskan birds through the Alaska Sea Life Center's videoconference entitled Beaks, Bubbles and Burrows, which included the opportunity for each child to make a clay

The Alaska Sea Life Center sent frozen squid from Seward to Nome for a Cephlapod dissection videoconference.

The Cleveland Museum of Natural History presented a videoconference regarding forces and motion that included hands-on experiments that bubbled and fizzed.

The Ann Arbor Hands-on Museum in Michigan taught the kids how to make slime and ooblek during their Slime, Time and States of Matter videoconference.

Nome Eskimo Community's Outdoor Club attended the Center for Puppetry Arts videoconference entitled Discovering Puppetry in Other Cultures during which the kids learned about puppets from different cultures and constructed their own Chinese inspired puppet to take home.

The older kids also did several different crafts, including molding shapes out of polymer clay, making continued on page 15 and painting with self-rising paint called puff paint and creating designs out of duct tape.

On Tuesday mornings the library hosted a story hour with corresponding weekly crafts and books for children ages 3 to 7. These young readers created stick and paper bag puppets as well as collages that matched the theme of the week. The younger kids' crafts included everything from making a fun Orange Aardvark puppet to reading about volcanoes and making a volcano collage. During the special pirate story hour, a pirate was the surprise guest and the kids made pirate ships as their craft of the day.

This summer, 133 young people signed up for the library's preschool and Elementary School reading program.

The videoconference programs were made possible by a grant from the Alaska State Library. The Kegoayah Kozga Library is a partner with Nome Eskimo Community in many literacy programs that are offered throughout the year. This summer, they partnered to launch a summer reading program for older teens.

These programs are in place to promote the importance of reading throughout the year, but especially during the summer. The students that read during the summer can retain and even surpass their reading abilities. The library aims to encourage students to read during the summer and enhance their student achievement when they start back to school in August. The library strives to be a place for students and kids that is both educational and fun. Library Director Marguerite La Riviere says the key to becoming a lifelong reader is discovering the authors and what genres you like to read. The library has been trying to help do just that.

To the Rescue

Residents of Pilot Point are thanking the mariners aboard Crowley Maritime Corp.'s tugboat Sesok after its crewmembers recently extinguished a dangerous blaze on the shores of the Yukon River fishing village.

The Sesok crew was conducting a routine, petroleum transfer from a fuel barge to onshore storage tanks when a pile of building materials trusses, foam insulation boards and plywood – caught on fire about 75 feet from the shore side connection hose, releasing toxic fumes and a thick plume of dark smoke into the air. That's when the tug captain, Crowley's Matt McLain, quickly ordered his crew to suspend operations, muster on deck and follow the company's fire emergency action

"Thankfully, we have fire drills aboard the vessel each week," said

McLain. "Even though our training is centered around vessel fires, we were able to adapt accordingly and assist the villagers."

Some crewmembers used the tug's fire extinguishers to fight the flames, while others led onlookers away from the toxic fumes. The crew also utilized the Sesok's portable water pump to combat the blaze with fresh river water.

It took the crew about two hours to fully extinguish the fire. They then safely completed the fuel transfer and sailed to their next destination, as scheduled.

"Our job doesn't stop at the boat and barge," said Crowley Port Captain Patrick Burns. "We have a responsibility to keep communities safe, too. And that's exactly what the crew aboard the Sesok did in Pilot Point."

NSEDC's Community Benefits department is now accepting funding proposals for the 2015 OEF program. OEF application packets are available online, at NSEDC offices in Nome, Anchorage and Unalakleet and from your local community liai-

Through the OEF program, $60,000 is allocated to each of NSEDC's member communities each year, supporting projects or programs at the community level. An additional $100,000, or 10 percent of the total OEF program funds, is specifically available for projects and programs with a regional scope.

Beyond the funding allocated toward community and regional programs, NSEDC puts priority on support for fisheries-related projects in the region. NSEDC's Board of Directors may elect to fund fisheries-related projects through NSEDC's internal budget process. This requires that applications for fisheriesrelated projects be submitted prior to the NSEDC Board of Directors' budget meetings, and thus they have an earlier application deadline. Projects approved through NSEDC's regular budget process do not affect the overall amount available through the OEF program.

Last year, under the same program guidelines, NSEDC received 36 project proposals and awarded $730,855 to community, regional and fisheriesrelated projects in the region.

What You Need to Know

By Rep. Les Gara

It's interesting how $12 million in oil company ads don't mention what you need to know. All oil fields after 2003, and all future oil fields, pay us a NEGATIVE or NEAR ZERO value for Alaska's oil under this SB 21's Production Tax. That's in the "Scott Goldsmith" report, and that part has been hidden in TV ads for too long.

Just in case the high-priced oil company ad folks who've never actually read the bill that's up for an August 19 Repeal Vote can't find it, they should check page19 of the Goldsmith presentation. I'm sure the smart London and Houston executives orchestrating the ads can help find that for their advertising folks.

A near zero or negative oil tax value is a pathway to a damaged economy. It will continue the loss of teachers, and grow this year's $1+ billion budget deficit so Alaska loses jobs the state can't afford in road construction and maintenance, engineering, public safety, private business-state contracts, and health care. SB 21 is a recipe to hit the businesses where these employees spend their money.

Wait. There are many other multi-million dollar PR myths.

$12 million is plenty to tell you oil investment actually grew vastly by over 50% - under the prior oil law, ACES. But ad folks who are paid to mislead claim the new law is "turning around" a non-existent ACES investment "decline" that was in fact an investment boom. I'd like an honest, equal partnership with oil companies, not the junior partnership SB 21 creates.

And oil companies that made handsome annual Alaska oil profits under ACES - of roughly $2 billion every year each - apparently can't afford to tell you this truth.

SB 21 produces a steep oil production decline, and less oil than ACES would have. Where does that come from? Facts, not ads.

Parnell's Department of Revenue produces what it calls its most accurate oil production forecast ever with input from the industry. It says under SB 21 North Slope production will fall by 40 percent in the next decade. Worse yet, by 2022, they conceded this untold gem. In their last ACES forecast (April, 2013) they said ACES would produce more oil by 2022 than SB 21 (April, 2014 SSB 21 forecast).

Why? Because SB 21 doesn't require its massive tax breaks — some of which get you a negative or near zero value for your oil - to be invested in Alaska. Under ACES, or any smart improvements on ACES, companies can only reasonably buy down their tax rate if they invest in Alaska to bolster Alaska production.

What about those mythical "new" fields? The 50 percent-plus investment increase under the ACES paid to develop and explore all the pretend "new" fields companies claim they are investing in because of SB 21. That's CD-5, Moose's and Bear Tooth in the National Petroleum Reserve, years of announced expansion commitments in Kuparuk, a 2012 announcement that they'd start producing in the southwest corner of Kuparuk, Exxon's Point Thomson field, and every field companies invested millions in under ACES and now claim is the result of SB 21.

It gets worse. SB 21 wouldn't reward illegal conduct, would it? It does. Exxon violated the law for 30 years by breaching their lease duty to develop the large Point Thomson field. Legal action was brought against Exxon under ACES to force production from this field. That case was settled under ACES to require this production. By delaying devel-

So, how can the state can get a negative or zero worth under SB 21? As Goldsmith explained at his last public presentation, post-2003 and future oil fields — cryptically called "GVR" oil in SB 21 — pay so low a tax rate that it barely or never covers the money the state gives up front to oil companies during the development of those projects, in Tax credit and deductions.

Vote No! On Ballot Measure 1

SPEAKING WITH ONE VOICE

We have seen what the old tax system gave us — an average of 6% decline in production each year.

Under the new reform, we've seen the production decline zeroed out after just six months of oil tax reform being in effect. We need to keep oil tax reform working. Vote No on ballot measure 1.

— Cheryl Stine, ASRC Executive VP, Chief Administrative Officer

Alaska's old tax system resulted in a $1 billion giveaway and didn't produce a drop of new oil. The new system has nearly eliminated the production decline, resulted in $10 billion in industry investments, and a record number of rigs working on the Slope. Let's give oil tax reform a chance. Vote No on ballot measure 1.

— Sophie Minich, CIRI President & CEO

We can't sit by as the amount of oil in the pipeline continues to decline. The pipeline is now 3/4 empty, and oil tax reform is our best opportunity to increase oil production. It's already working.

I'm voting No so it can continue to work for my family and my people.

— Charlotte Brower, Mayor, North Slope Borough

Make no mistake — oil tax reform is working. Since the new tax law passed, six new rigs have been announced and nearly $10 billion in new investments (State DOR 2/14) to produce more oil.

Vote No on One to keep oil tax reform working.

– Helvi Sandvik, NANA Development Corporation President

It's important for our families, our children and for future generations, that we vote No on ballot measure 1 and give oil tax reform a chance to work.

- Tara Sweeney, ASRC Executive VP, External Affairs

No matter where you live, Alaska's oil affects your life — through education funding, the Permanent Fund dividend, and services that benefit us all. Keep Alaska on the right track and vote No on ballot measure 1.

— Gail Schubert, BSNC President & CEO

On Election Day, Aug. 19, let us speak with one voice: VOTE NO! ON BALLOT MEASURE 1.

A 39-year-old diver died on Wednesday, August 13 evening while diving for gold off the gold dredge Argo.

The man was identified as Sean Beals of Seattle, Washington.

The Alaska State Troopers received a report at 10:41 p.m. of an unresponsive diver working off the dredge, located half a mile offshore

NSEDC bridges Foster building funding gap

By Sandra L. Medearis

Crews are building water and sewer services into the site where the Richard Foster Building will contain the City's library, Carrie M. McLain Museum and leasable space for Kawerak Inc.'s Beringia Center of Culture and Science.

A $1.5 million grant to the City of Nome from NSEDC has brought the funding to the top and made the project whole, Mayor Denise Michels said Monday.

The total cost of the facility is $19

"This is a great relief that the proiect is fully funded. We thought we were going to have to cut out some of the fixtures and furniture for now," Michels said. "This is a great show of commitment and funding support by Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. to our region for projects in Nome and throughout the Bering Strait region."

The project has been on the workbench for six years during planning and most recently while the City and Kawerak beat the bushes to complete funding.

The building is named in honor of the late Rep. Richard Foster, District 39's representative for decades in state Legislature.

"We are thrilled the NSEDC Board of Directors chose to support this building and the partnership between the City of Nome and Kawerak," Kawerak President Melanie Bahnke said in a statement. "Thanks to NSEDC's substantial support for the project, we will now have a space to protect our cultural collections, build educational programs, and celebrate and perpetuate the rich historical and living cultures of the

Kobuk River sees large fish die-off

According to Alaska Fish and Game, a large fish die-off has been observed along the shores of the Kobuk River. Reports from Kiana, Ambler and Shungnak that hundreds of fish died off in the river reached ADF&G offices this week.

Norton Sound-Port Clarence Areas, told the Nome Nugget that the dead fish were mostly chum salmon, but dead grayling, white fish and pike were also observed.

USFWS personnel flew along the Kobuk River on Monday and reported the largest concentration of dead salmon were found near Kiana.

The fish had not yet spawned and there weren't any obvious signs of

A ADF&G fish manager for the Northwest and North Slope regions will also travel to Kotzebue and will check at the Noatak River if any similar die-offs happened there.

According to Menard, pathologists believe that the fish died of low dissolved oxygen in the water, due to a combination of a huge number of chum returns in the river, the stress of being crowded and of possibly warm water temperatures

Kobuk residents said they had not seen a salmon die off like this before. Menard said such phenomena have been observed in years when large numbers of fish return to rivers, depleting the available oxygen. Also, when fish are forced into the shallows, the sun burns their backs.

ADF&G personnel observed that the fish had not yet been spawned Menard said it is unusual to see a large chum die-off.

Large fish die-offs have been observed mostly with pink salmon when pinks return to rivers in high numbers.

Letters -

We are profoundly disappointed and frustrated that the trustees of the defunct Sheldon Jackson College have filed a notice to appeal a recent federal decision rejecting their claim to 160 acres by Redoubt Falls and surrounding areas near Sitka.

The Bureau of Land Management's (BLM) rejection of their land claim was a victory for the Sitka Tribe of Alaska and Sealaska, which filed for title of 11-acres around Redoubt Falls almost 40 years ago under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. The Act allows regional Native corporations to select land that is historically or culturally im-

For nearly four decades, Sealaska has sought to protect the site, which we know as Kunáa, a culturally important area that was historically owned by the Kiks.ádi Clan. Sealaska's claim was finally beginning to move through the BLM process when the college suddenly filed its claim in 2012. In July, the BLM adjudication branch ruled that the Sheldon Jackson trustees failed to prove ownership, and on Aug. 6 they filed a notice to appeal and moved for a stay on BLM action. The appeal means yet another costly delay. And we are left to wonder: who is really behind this effort and what do they really want?

The trustees claim their motive is to ensure that the public has continued access to the sockeye fishery in the area. In early 2012, months before the trustees filed their claim, Sealaska, the tribe, the Forest Service, and the City of Sitka held intensive negotiations and produced a property management agreement for Redoubt Falls that would go into place if the BLM transferred the 11 acres to Sealaska. Under that plan, the public would be guaranteed continued subsistence access. The Forest Service would have continued use of its weir and fisheries enhancement program at Redoubt Falls, and under a separate agreement between Sealaska and the Tribe, the Tribe would have taken on primary responsibility for stewardship of the acreage. The property transfer to Sealaska would have been seamless, and the public would not have noticed anything different in the way the property was being managed. The parties were near consensus when the trustees filed their claim, which brought the process to a

The trustees argue that if Sealaska owned the land, the future of public access to the Redoubt Falls area is in question. However, Sealaska and Sitka Tribe of Alaska agree that public access will continue to be the priority. How does a transfer to the college ensure continued access in

And on that point, if the Redoubt Falls property transfers to the defunct college, does it then become vulnerable to taking by their creditors? What if one of their creditors seized control of the area, built a private fishing lodge, and closed the area to the public? Will anyone continue to administer property owned by the college in the future, when it is our understanding that the entity will cease to exist in the near future?

The approach we endorsed was a win-win: the property would transfer to Sealaska, a federally-recognized tribal entity; the stewardship of this historic site would fall to STA, a federally-recognized tribe; the Forest Service would have continued use of its weir and fisheries enhancement program there; and the area would continue to be open to subsistence

We respectfully ask the trustees to stop their appeal. Stop fighting us. You are scratching old wounds. The namesake of Sheldon Jackson College came to Alaska to stamp out Native languages and cultures, and the pain of those times lives on in our people today. We respectfully ask the trustees to cease their efforts to claim this historic Tlingit site as their own and not further delay a return to Native ownership and management. Sincerely.

Michael A. Baines, Tribal Chairman Sitka Tribe of Alaska

It's a Brand New School Year

Fresh new paint and the aroma of paste tinged with the lingering fragrance of Lysol greet the bright new faces as they head back to the classroom. In Nome and all over Alaska youngsters are greeted by old friends, making new ones and are welcomed by their teachers. New books, new clothes, and new backpacks - everyone is set for a good start to the school year.

So students, you don't need advice. Everyone has probably told you what to do and what not to do. Most of you are perfectly capable of making intelligent decisions. You are starting this school year with a clean slate. The city, state and federal governments have put in a lot of money to make the best education available to you. Take advantage of public education. Seek help when you need it and don't be afraid to ask questions.

Students, you have a responsibility to get your homework done. Don't fall behind. Study hard and get plenty of sleep (not in class). Eat a good breakfast and get to school on time. Remember, what you learn is yours forever; no one can take it from you. And what you don't learn, well that's yours too. -N.L.M.-

Upcoming climate talks likely to fall short of goals

Inside Climate News reports that a study by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology predict that the climate treaty negotiations in Paris are likely to come up short of the goal to slow global warming. The MIT report "Expectations for a New Climate Agreement," was written by Henry Jacoby and Henry Chen of MIT's program on the science and policy of global change. The researchers conclude that the world's nations seem unwilling to make the kind of pledges to curb emissions responsible for global warming and bring them down to safe levels by the end of the century.

"Our analysis concludes that these international efforts will indeed bend at the curve of global emissions" of carbon dioxide and other planetwarming greenhouse gases, the paper said. "However, our results also show that these efforts will not put the globe on a path consistent with commonly stated long-term climate goals.'

The researchers also predicted that emissions would grow by the year 2050, that greenhouse gas concentrations would exceed 530 or 580 parts per million by the end of the century. This summer, concentrations measured at a CO<sub>2</sub> monitoring station at the Mauna Loa Observatory on the Big Island of Hawaii peaked above 400 ppm for an entire

UN talks were held under the assumption that nations want to find a way to keep global warming within 2°C. To achieve this goal, scientists say countries can release no more than 1,000 gigatons of carbon dioxide into the atmosphere in total. At this point, the global pollution budget is already more than half spent and if emissions are spent at the current rate, the world will exhaust its budget within 20 or 30 district's chief of the planning section as well as the lead planner and project manager on multiple studies, including the Alaska Deep Draft Arctic Port Study and Alaska Baseline Erosion Assessment, which was honored with the Corps of Engineers Planning Achievement Award in

UN Secretary General Ban Kimoon called for a climate talk meeting in New York in September, which coincides with the annual Climate Week activities in New York.

He began his Corps career in 1993 with the Seattle District where he served in many capacities, including hydraulic engineer, project manager, plan formulator and program manager. Sexauer transferred to the Alaska District as a senior planner in 2003.

Sexauer's Corps civil works planning experience has included project formulation for ecosystem restoration, flood risk management, navigation and recreation. He is well versed in the Corps Emergency Management programs through planning and implementing multiple levee rehabilitation projects.

Sexauer earned a Bachelor of Science degree in civil engineering from the University of Washington in 1992, completed the Seattle District Leadership Development Program in 1999 and graduated from the Corps Planning Associates Program in Sexauer has served on and led multiple review teams for studies and projects from several other Corps offices, including the Baltimore, Los Angeles, Portland, Sacramento and Seattle districts.

NOAA: Fisheries disaster relief funds granted

NOAA Fisheries Alaska Region approved of the first grant application in the amount of $7.8 million to assist fishermen affected by the 2012 commercial fisheries failure due to the fishery resource disaster for the Yukon Chinook fishery, Kuskokwim Chinook fishery and the Cook Inlet salmon fishery.

This award covers direct payments to commercial fishermen. The Yukon-Kuskokwim Region will receive $3.2 million and the Cook Inlet Region will receive $4.6 million.

"From the moment we learned that Alaska would receive fishery disaster relief funds, our first priority has been to get those dollars directly into the hands of fishermen who were impacted by the fisheries failure," said Alaska Regional Administrator Jim Balsiger. "Approval of the grant application for direct assistance means that will happen very Impacted fishermen will be receiving their application for these disaster relief funds in the mail.

The Pacific States Marine Fisheries Commission is developing a second grant proposal for the remaining funds, about $13 million. They proposals will be based on spend plans provided by representative groups identified by the State of Alaska and the Congressional Delegation. NOAA Fisheries expects to award this second grant in the coming months.

America's increasing attention on the Arctic is timely and well deserved, but it's important to recognize that there have been many individuals and organizations whose focus on the Arctic over the years we are now building on.

We can point posthumously to statesmen such as Wally Hickel and Walt Parker whose life works contributed to this issue, and more recently to our Congressional delegation, the U.S. Arctic Research Commission (chaired by Mead Treadwell and subsequently Fran Ulmer), and the University of Alaska, all of whom have developed a body of Arctic expertise over decades.

Too often the response to "Arctic" is from a position that the U.S. is behind in understanding the reality, challenge and opportunity of the region.

Alaskans have been at the forefront in responding to and thriving in the harsh arctic environment.

What is new to this equation is the scale of attention – the urgency felt by local communities to maintain and support their traditional ways of life, renewed national interest in strategic security and defense, and the investment interest by the public and private sectors around the world.

The newly announced Special Representative of the Arctic Region, who is visiting Alaska this week, and the recently launched Arctic Economic Council should be seen as part of a historic trend, then, toward more effective governance, responsiveness, and security in a region that is experiencing rapid and unpredictable change.

Each of these efforts points to a strategic, purposeful approach to addressing the future of the Arctic, and to making sure that opportunity doesn't pass us by.

FULL STEAM AHEAD—Ridge Contracting crews work to extend city water and sewer services to Nome's Richard Foster Building site at the north end of Steadman Street. The City received a $1.5 million grant from Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., completing funding for the library, museum and culture complex. "We have now the money to complete the building with a few needs still on the list, for example, land-scaping items before ribbon-cutting day," John K. Handeland, of the City's museum and library commission, said.

obstructions and the water and sewer services are under way.

The City obtained about $17 million for the project through the State of Alaska.

Then came a $1.3 million from Rasmuson Foundation.

Kawerak, Inc. also contributed to the project, which has a price tag of $19 million.

The funding was approved at NSEDC's second quarter board meetings August 12 in Nome and will ensure the Beringia Center is included in the City of Nome's Richard Foster Building, slated to be complete by 2016.

"Our mission at NSEDC is to provide economic development, and we're happy this funding will be used to create jobs during the construction phase and beyond, with the implementation of cultural programs at the Beringia Center," Dan Harrelson, NSEDC board chairman said.

"While regionally significant, the Richard Foster Building is a project that shows the strength in partnership and working together."

Norton Sound Economic Development Corp. is a private 501(c) 4 non-profit corporation representing 15 member communities and more than 8,490 people in the Bering Strait Region of Northwestern Alaska.

It is one of six Community Development Quota organizations dealing with programs in Bering Sea fisheries and long-term investments to provide a source of economic support to the region.

U.S. Special Representative for the Arctic Admiral Robert Papp visited Alaska on August 12-19. He consulted with policy-makers, local representatives, indigenous leaders, environmental organizations, business leaders and others in the state. Admiral Papp's meetings in Anchorage, Fairbanks and Barrow focused on climate change, economic, environmental and security issues in the Arctic region as the United States prepares to assume the chairmanship of the Arctic Council in 2015.

No new icebreaker for the Coast Guard

The magazine National Defense reports that the Coast Guard needs $1 billion to build a new polar icebreaker and it looks like funding sources are scarce. According to a story in the September issue of the magazine, Navy and other officials from federal agencies testified to the importance of attaining a new icebreaker for the Arctic. The magazine quotes Alaska Rep. Don Young speaking out against the funding. You're not going to get the $1 billion from this Congress to build a new icebreaker. That's simple. You're not going to get it," Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, told a senior Coast Guard official at a House Transportation Committee Coast Guard and maritime transportation subcommittee hearing. Congress is hesitant to budget funds for a new icebreaker because federal agencies have failed to come up with a collaborative budget plan. Represented at the hearing were leaders from the Department of State, Department of Commerce, National Science Foundation and the State of Alaska.

Statoil's drill campaign in Barents Sea unsuccessful

The Arctic Journal reports that Statoil's exploration campaign in the far north of the Barents Sea failed to find commercial quantities of hydrocarbons. Statoil is a Norwegian stateowned company, with an Alaska office and interests in the Beaufort Sea. Statoil had high hopes for the three test wells the company planned to drill this summer in the Barents Sea after making finds in the area in 2011 and 2012. Statoil's exploration campaign was challenged by Greenpeace. The organization filed a complaint in Norwegian courts and Statoil was ordered to stop all activity while the court pondered the matter. Once Statoil was given the green light to begin operations, Greenpeace activists positioned their ship Esperanza above the drill site. The Norwegian Coast Guard boarded the vessel and removed it from the area.

The Arctic Journal says that commercial strikes in the far north have proved notoriously elusive. Only Gazprom, a Russian state-owned firm, has a commercial hydrocarbon operation at an offshore site in the Arctic

The Hill reports on Tuesday that Shell indicated last week that it is leaving Arctic drilling operations on the table for 2015, after canceling plans for exploration this year.

Shell CEO Ben van Beurden told reporters that the legal holdup surrounding leasing in the Arctic doesn't mean Shell is slowing down, the Houston Chronicle reports.

In January, Shell pulled out of drilling in the Arctic Ocean for 2014 due to legal issues with the Interior Department's lease sales.

Begich, U.S. DOT Secretary and Coast Guard Commandant visit Nome and Unalakleet on whirlwind tour

By Diana Haecker

U.S. Senator Mark Begich, the U.S. Secretary of the Dept. of Transportation Anthony Foxx and the new Commandant for the U.S. Coast Guard Paul Zukunft arrived in a Coast Guard jet in Nome on Friday morning for a tour of Nome and Unalakleet to learn about air and maritime transportation issues affecting the region.

The Alaska Municipal League hosted a question and answer period with the guests from Washington D.C. in the morning, before the dignitaries toured the port and harbor facilities in Nome. They then left for Unalakleet for a roundtable discussion on the community's infrastructure needs.

The purpose of the trip was to learn about the needs of coastal Alaska as the state faces an increase in maritime traffic through the Bering Strait, the lack of emergency response capabilities and the sparse infrastructure in place to connect communities.

Begich's press secretary said the Senator wanted the DOT Secretary to see first hand transportation realities in Alaska and to understand the complexity of transportation logistics of the largest state in the union.

Senator Begich is a member of the Senate Commerce, Science and Transportation Committee, which deals with investments to airport safety and FAA policies. The U.S. Maritime Administration and the Federal Aviation Administration are under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the U.S. DOT.

The tour marked Sec. Foxx's first visit to Alaska.

In an address to city managers and mayors at the Alaska Municipal League meeting at the Rec Center on Friday morning, Sec. Foxx pointed out that there is an intense debate going on about the future of the U.S. transportation system in Washington D.C.

He seemed concerned about the fact that there has not been a long-term transportation plan formulated in the past six years.
"We already know today that the

"We already know today that the country has almost double the need to move freight around and double the demand on our system over the next 35 years for freight," said Foxx to Nome media outlets after the event.

"If you can imagine, doubling the amount of maritime traffic, doubling the amount of freight rail traffic, doubling the amount of aviation traffic, it's gonna strain our system if we don't have the infrastructure in place. The goal right now is to design a system based on how freight actually moves, to be able to delineate projects that will contribute to growth of freight in this country and that would include maritime projects, then make the case to Congress to put the resources in place to do it."

Foxx pointed to the development of a piece of legislation called the Grow America Act. The act is supposed to address the shortfall in the Highway Trust Fund and provide $87 billion to fix the nation's backlog of deficient bridges and aging transit systems. It aims to create jobs repairing and modernizing roads, bridges, railways and transit systems. The act also promises to provide certainty to state and local governments that must engage in long-term planning and to reduce project approval and permitting timelines while delivering better outcomes for communities and the environment.

Foxx said under the Act, an additional $30 million would flow to Alaska just for transit systems.

Seeing the remoteness of Nome and the region first hand brought the realization to Foxx that people, no matter how challenged by transportation gaps, need to get up in the morning, get their kids to school and themselves to work. But can he help the region with keeping the dust from gravel roads down? As an answer, Foxx laughed, saying, "Ah, you know, we need to make sure we do everything we can to get roads built, to get bridges built, to get the airport infrastructure you need. If you need to help with the dust, we try to help you, but we want to make sure we are prioritizing the needs."

U.S. Coast Guard Commandant Zukunft said that it takes 10 years for the government to react to changes that are happening and that prompter action is necessary. He said that Alaska is the only state with a U.S. Coast Guard growth portfolio, meaning that there is an understanding of the crucial role the Coast Guard has to play here. The state of Alaska makes the USA an Arctic nation. Thus, the Coast Guard needs to be equipped with the tools to fulfill their mission. Zukunft said, "We're all-in in the State of Alaska."

On the world stage, the International Maritime Organization held a workshop in Seattle last week dealing with the drafting of a "Polar Code." Despite the aim to include Arctic stakeholders, no Alaskan participated in last week's workshop, Zukunft said. He wants to see that changed.

Asked if there are thoughts of bringing a more permanent Coast Guard presence to Nome or the region, Zukunft said that the northernmost forward operating base to home-port ships will probably remain in Kodiak. "Our biggest challenge isn't so much where to tie the ships up but where to maintain them," he said. "Where do we bring in parts, the logistics?" He said the Coast Guard finds it more cost effective to have a larger clustering of Guard presence. "For now the best economy of scale is when we cluster these and maybe a few other locations, but not in multiple locations."

HOW DO WE KNOW?— St. Michael Mayor Bobbi Ann Andrews asked the panel, especially Admiral Zukunft, how small coastal communities can stay informed about transiting ships and vessels that are anchoring offshore in the summer time.

Senator Begich pointed to the notyet released Army Corps of Engineers study, which created a short list of potential candidate sites for an Arctic deep-draft port. Those sites were Nome and Port Clarence.

As the Coast Guard goes into missions further north, Begich said, they will need access to deep-water ports. "So you may not have a station for all seasons that they're working from," Begich said. "But there is a critical need that they have access points to service their ships."

Mallott, Walker meet in gubernatorial debate in Nome

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Alaska Municipal League held its summer conference in Nome, bringing not only Alaska mayors, city managers and AML directors to the Gold Rush city, but also gubernatorial candidates and federal politicians.

On Thursday, the AML conference hosted a two-hour gubernatorial debate at the Rec Center.

The debate took place between Democrat Byron Mallot and independent candidate Bill Walker.

Incumbent Governor Sean Parnell was invited but was not present to participate in the debate, an absence noted by both Mallott and Walker as frequently occurring. "Only twice has the incumbent governor joined us, and we've done maybe 10 debates," said Mallott.

"Shame on him for not being here," commented Bill Walker.

The debate took place with a civil tone and calm manner. The election drama plays out in the Republican primary race for the U.S. Senate seat.

Bill Walker of Anchorage introduced himself to the forum. "I'm not running because I'm looking for a career or because I want to become a politician," he said. "I'm running because Alaska is in trouble."

Walker, a lawyer operating his own law firm specializing in municipal and oil and gas law, said he was motivated to run for governor because of the dire economic deficit forecast for Alaska. He is worried about the future of Alaska. "We are spending $7 million a day, burning through Alaska's savings account," he stated. Walker said he valued local government, promised he would establish liaisons to local governments and would reestablish a Department of Regional Affairs. Walker said he would focus on fixing the economy first Byron Mallott was born and raised in Yakutat to his Tlingit mother and his father from Washington. He has served under several governors. Mallott looks back on a long career in both the public and private sector. He was the first Commissioner of Alaska's Department of Community and Regional Affairs under Governor Bill Egan and worked for Governor Jay Hammond's administration. In 1994 Mallott won the Mayoral election in Juneau. He most recently retired as the President and CEO of First Alaskans Institute.

Mallott's opening statement to the AML convention included the assertion that the Alaska Constitution calls for a maximum of local self-government control. Mallott said he strongly believes that state government has to reach out to local governments and that cabinet leaders should have a relationship with local governments.

The debate then turned to questions from the audience to be answered by both candidates. The controversy about Secretary Jewell's refusal to allow building a road through Izembek National Park? A symbol of the broken relationship between state and federal governments, both candidates agreed. While Walker pushed for building more infrastructure, roads, bridges, gas pipelines, Mallott focused in his answer on community consultation and the careful weighing of costs and benefits to those involved.

Mallott said outright he supports a woman's right to choose. Walker did not directly answer the question but said he would not make any changes to current laws.

What about Senate Bill 21, the controversial oil tax overhaul? Walker said he would vote Yes on ballot measure 1 that seeks to repeal SB 21. "The lack of oil coming through the pipeline is not a tax issue. We need more companies to develop oil fields and we need to incentivize exploration for smaller companies. We incentivize the wrong activity," said Walker. Byron Mallott kept his answer to the process of how SB 21 was presented and pushed through. The bill was introduced by Governor Sean Parnell. "A governor should always act and clearly articulate the benefits to Alaskans," Mallott said. Mallott said he has no problem with oil and gas companies acting to further their interests. "But I have huge difficulty accepting that decisions they argue for become law of our land without the state making counter arguments. Decisions should be made for the good of all of Alaska," he said.

Another question addressed the energy crisis in rural Alaska. Walker: "Stop studying and start building. We need to treat energy as a crisis that it is." Mallott elaborated on difficult decisions villagers have to make as heating oil and gas gets ever more expensive in rural communities. "As governor, I would appoint an 'Energy Chief'," he said. "Not a czar, but a chief, to coordinate, reach out and bring the force of the governor's office to build a robust response to the crisis."

Topics covered in the debate ranged from building a state health care exchange to the struggle of public safety in rural areas, to the overcrowded prison system in Alaska and education.

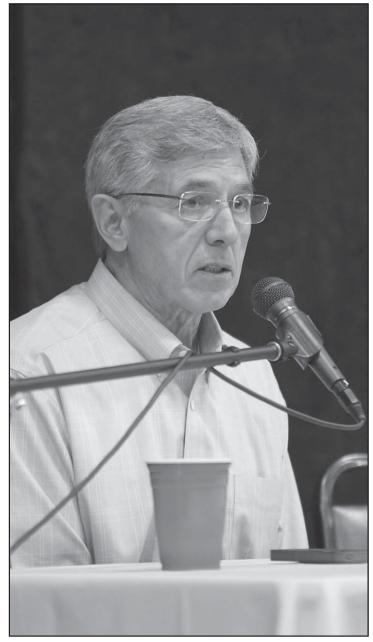

Mallott repeatedly talked about creating equity and equality in all topics that were touched on during the debate. He spoke about attracting capital and intellectual capacity to Alaska, about leading civil debates, focusing on the common good for all Alaskans and for finding solutions crossing the aisle.

Walker reiterated the urgency he feels as the Alaskan economy slides and the current administration dipping into the savings account to pay for government services. "I don't like the Alaska we're in now," he said. "I want to fix Alaska." He proposed to quit studying problems and begin building infrastructure.

Asked about addressing negative impacts of climate change, Mallott said he would make it a high priority to develop climate change adaptation plans. "I would take a personal interest in becoming engaged in these issues," Mallott told the Nome Nugget.

Bill Walker said he would focus of fixing the economy first. "I can't say it is a priority of mine, we need to fix our economy first," Walker said.

DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE— Byron Mallott is the Democratic gubernatorial candidate. Incumbent Governor Sean Parnell did not show up for the debate in Nome.

Norton Sound and Kotzebue fish report for mid-August

By Jim Menard, ADF&G

CRAB:

The 2014 summer season red king crab fishery has ended and 33 vessels harvested 389,008 pounds and the harvest was 6,208 pounds over the guideline harvest level.

SALMON: Norton Sound

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon catches this season are: 280 kings, 102,000 chums, 180,000 pinks, 350 reds and 61,000 silvers by 80 permit holders. The department silver salmon forecast for the commercial fishery harvest was 60,000 to 90,000 fish and projections show that the upper end of the range should nearly be reached and may be exceeded.

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 60 kings, 140 reds, 30,800 chums, 82,200 pinks and 34,000 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest is on track for a top 15 finish.

North River Tower - Camp J.B. -Escapement goals: King 1,200-2,600; Chum-No goal established; Pink 25,000; Silver 550-1,100 (aerial surgoal) cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count for 12 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26 with half day counts and full day counts beginning on July 29. Cumulative counts through August 15 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,300 kings, 11,000 chums, 144,000 pinks and 2,000 silvers. The average historical midpoint of the silver run past the tower has been August 15.

Unalakleet River Floating Weir -No weir escapement goals yet established - cooperative project; Fish & Game, Native Village of Unalakleet, United States BLM and NSEDC. Major funding provided by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service - Office of Subsistence Management.

The weir crew was unable to count for nearly six days because of high water and full day counts resumed on July 27. Cumulative counts through August 15 should be considered minimal for all species and were 1,000 kings, 52,000 chums, 1.2 million pinks, 200 reds and 27,000 silvers. There are only two previous years when counting continued until mid-August and this year's silver count is nearly 50% ahead of both years.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 16 kings, 39 reds, 28,400 chums, 33,000 pinks and 12,900 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest is on track for a top 10 fin-

The tower crew was been unable to count since July 13 due to high water, but did get the sonar unit set back up on August 4 and it is now counting. Cumulative counts through August 13 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,000 kings, 52,000 chums, 420,000 pinks and 3,000 sil-

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 70 kings, 15 reds, 12,600 chums, 28,000 pinks and 5,300 silvers. The silver harvest trails only last year's record harvest of 5,485 silvers.

Elim Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 96 kings, 116 reds, 16,700 chums, 28,200 pinks and 7,500 silvers. The silver harvest by mid-August is ahead of all years. The record harvest was 10,180 silvers in 2010.

Kwiniuk River Tower - Camp Joel Escapement goals: King 300-550: Chum 11,500 - 23,000; Pink 8,400; Silver 650-1,300 (aerial survey goal). Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 15 were 429 kings, 40,000 chums, 326,000 pinks and 7,700 silvers. For mid-August the silver count is above all years, except for the record count of 2006. The average historical midpoint for silvers past the tower is August 15.

Golovin Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 28 kings, 44 reds, 13,500 chums, 7,900 pinks and 2,000 silvers. The silver harvest is on track for a top 5 finish. The record harvest was 5.586 silvers in 2010 and last year's harvest was second best with 5,362 silvers.

Fish River Tower - No escapement goals established - cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count for 11 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26. Cumulative counts through August 15 should be considered minimal for all species and were 900 kings, 45,000 chums, 220,000 pinks, 15 reds and 12,500 sil-

Nome Subdistrict

Subsistence set gillnet fishing is open in the marine waters 7 days a week with no catch limits. The fresh water subsistence area set gillnet schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Check the back of the Nome Subdistrict subsistence salmon permit for the subsistence areas where set gillnetting is allowed and the catch limits by river. Beach seining is not allowed.

All pink salmon subsistence catch limits throughout Nome Subdistrict are waived, and except for the Solomon, Penny and Cripple rivers all chum salmon subsistence catch limits are waived throughout Nome Subdistrict.

Commercial salmon fishing will remain closed until the department projects there are sufficient silvers for both subsistence and escapement.

Nome River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 2,900 - 4,300; Pink 13,000 – Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 15 were 5 kings, 5,400 chums, 95,000 pinks, 20 reds and 300 silvers. The average historical first quarter point for silvers past the weir is August 14 and the midpoint is August 28.

Cumulative counts through August 15 were 8 kings, 3,900 chums, 19,000 pinks, 60 reds and 80 silvers. The average historical first quarter point for silvers past the weir is August 17 and the midpoint is August 26.

Solomon River Weir - No escapement goals yet established - Fish & Game project.

Cumulative counts through August 15 were 1,475 chums, 20,000 pinks and 50 silvers. Last year by this date the count was 1,331 chums and 89 silvers with a final count of 1,377 chums and 168 silvers.

Port Clarence District

Cumulative counts through August 15 were 47 kings, 24,000 chums, 4,100 pinks, 9,600 reds and 170 silvers.

Kotzebue

The 2014 Kotzebue commercial salmon fishery continues to roll along with the catch now over 542,000 chum salmon by 75 permit holders and ranks fourth greatest all-time and will likely rank third greatest by mid-week.

There have been nightly closures of the airport for needed maintenance work beginning last Wednesday evening that have resulted in a slowing of the fishery with reduced fishing hours because the buyers have concerns with getting fish shipped out. One buyer has stopped buying and has indicated they plan to resume buying later next week when the airport is scheduled to reopen 24 hours per day.

Kobuk River Test Fish - Fish & Game project.

The last day of test fishing was August 13. This year chum salmon catch index was all-time record even though the number of test fish drifts completed this year was the least in the 22-year

board hears new crab proposals NSEDC

The NSEDC board of directors met in Nome on Monday and Tuesday, August 11 and 12, for the second quarter committee and full board meetings.

The short agenda included two executive sessions: one dealing with Glacier Fish Company's SIU Alaska Corporation report given by John Eckels, and an update on Unaatuq LLC, a consortium of NSEDC and Alaska Native nonprofit entities from the Bering Strait region. The board also went into executive session to discuss an Individual Fishing Quota purchase for crab.

The board of directors took up several applications for grants. They voted to grant the City of Nome's request for $1.5 million for Kawerak, Inc.'s Beringia Science and Cultural Center to be housed in the Richard Foster Building. The board also granted the City of Elim's request for $375,605.64 for the Community Energy Fund to go towards the community's meter base replacement project. The board denied a request from Norton Sound Health Corporation for $400,000 for the planned Wellness and Training Center.

The board appointed Wes Jones to fill the seat as the regional processor representative to the Northern Bering Sea Regional Aquaculture Associa-

In a meeting of the bylaws committee, NSEDC general counsel Kyan Olanna reported that slight changes were made to the election forms for NSEDC member communities' representatives. In this year's municipal elections, Gambell, Golovin, Koyuk, Stebbins and Wales will chose representatives to the NSEDC board of directors.

Jim Menard ADF&G Area Manager for Commercial Fisheries Division for the Arctic-Kotzebue and Norton Sound-Port Clarence Areas updated the NSEDC board on news from the department.

The Allowable Biological Catch set by the North Pacific Fisheries Management Council is 417,000 pounds of legal size male red king crab. "In the summer fishery we harvested 360,853 and the CDQ will harvest 28,710 for a total of 389,563 pounds," Menard reported. "We go over the ABC if the winter commercial harvest this upcoming season is over 27,437 pounds."

That number would have been a record winter commercial harvest, but in the 2012-13 winter the commercial harvest was 62,000 pounds of legal size male king crab and last season was 34,000 pounds. He says that there has been a lot more commercial effort in the winter fishery in recent years. But change may be coming. ADF&G will make an Agenda Change Request to the Alaska Board of Fisheries to take up the issue before the next cycle of requests can be made for Norton Sound in the spring of 2016. Every three years the board takes proposals from an area, explained Menard. So what is the concern?

ADF&G's Scott Kent said that the department will submit two proposals. One aims to change the duration of the winter commercial season and the other proposal aims to set pot limits for the winter commercial fish-

The department wants the Norton Sound winter through-the-ice commercial king crab fishing season to be open by emergency order on or after February 15 and close April 30, unless extended by emergency order. "This change is necessary because of anticipated changes to the North Pacific Fishery Management Council's Crab Plan Team meeting schedule that will begin in fall 2014 with the NPFMC adopting Allowable Biological Catch and Over Fishing Level numbers in January or February," explained Kent. "This means that the winter commercial harvest will count against the ABC prior to the summer season harvest and thus ABC must be known prior to prosecuting the winter commercial fishery.'

In years with unstable ice cover. there have been significant numbers of pots lost due to high winds pushing pans of ice offshore. Kent reported to the NSEDC Fisheries Development Committee that at least 105 commercial pots were reportedly lost during the 2014 winter season.

The majority of pots were lost in January, well before the ice stabilized and at the tail end of the regulatory closure date, when nearshore ice began to deteriorate.

Kent expects more loss of crab pots given the current high levels of participation in the winter fishery. He argued that opening the fishery by emergency order on or after February 15 would reduce the chance of lost commercial gear during the early phase of ice formation. Moving the closure date from May 15 to April 30 would reduce the chance of lost pots as nearshore ice begins to melt.

The other proposal deals with limiting gear. ADF&G seeks to set a pot limit of 20 pots per permit holder for the winter. Currently no regulations are in place restricting the number of pots allowed per fishermen in the winter commercial crab fishery, Kent said. "In order to effectively manage the winter commercial fishery and mitigate potential impacts from pot loss on crab mortality and gear debris deposition, gear restrictions on the number of pots allowed are warranted.'

Jim Menard brought out colorful hand-draw charts of salmon harvest and reported the best commercial salmon harvest in Norton Sound since 1998. This year the harvest will be over 350,000 salmon, he said. The 2014 commercial chum harvest in Norton Sound will be over 100,000 fish for the fourth year in the last five vears. "The last five years have seen the best yearly commercial chum salmon harvests in 25 years,' Menard said. The commercial silver harvest in Norton Sound is expected to be at the top end of the commercial harvest forecast range of 60,000 to 90,000 fish.

Hoogendorn breaks record at 59 minute 37 second challenge

By Keith Conger

A record number 40 athletes stood at the base of Anvil Mountain on Thursday looking skyward at the daunting task of running, or walking, up to the White Alice fence and back at the 20th annual 59 Minute 37 Second Challenge.

Nome-Beltz High School sophomore Wilson Hoogendorn, 15, accepted the challenge and demonstrated the effects of his preseason cross-country training by becoming the first person ever to break the 22-minute mark in the race. Hoogendorn's time of 21 minutes, 42 seconds bested Nils Hahn's 2012 record run by 40 seconds.

Jeff Collins, who is on paternity leave from coaching the Nome-Beltz cross-country team, came in second place with a time of 22:27. Nome-Beltz freshman Harrison Moore, 14, shaved two and a half minutes off his personal record in the race to place third overall for the second consecutive year. He was the second person under the age of 16 to cross the line, and also the second high school boy to finish.

The first female to complete the challenge was current Nome-Beltz Nanooks cross-country running coach Crystal Tobuk in a time of 25:42. Christine Buffas, 16, was the second female to complete the course. With a time of 26:07, the Nome-Beltz junior was also the first high school girl to finish. The second high school girl to complete the course was sophomore Bianca Trowbridge, 15, at 30:39. Trowbridge was also the third female across the line.

Ava Earthman, 12, ran the race in 31 minutes 27 seconds, outlasting Mallory Conger, 12, by 12 seconds to be the first junior high girl to complete the challenge.

The youngest racer of the day was Son Erickson, 8. Erickson's time of 30:27 earned him the top elementary school spot, and helped him crack the top 20. Two other elementary school students, Lizzy Hahn, 10, and Natalie Tobuk, 9, completed the race.

Race organizer Leo Rasmussen says the race was given its unique name 20 years ago after he took his daughter Kristina out to show her that it was possible to go to the top and back. His time that day was 59 minutes, 37 seconds.

The course begins at the 300-foot elevation on the Anvil Mountain Road and ascends some 800 feet in just less than a mile and a half. Its main requirement is that participants complete the race in less time than Rasmussen's inaugural run.

MEET AND GREET — The gracious and friendly people of Gambell greet the plane as participants of the Arctic Resource Development and Infrastructure summit arrive on the western edge of Saint Lawrence Island.

Bering Sea Alliance hosts summit to discuss Arctic Resource Development and Infrastructure

By Keith Conger

"The Arctic is open for business," declared Paul Berkman, Ph.D of the Marine Science Institute, University of California, Santa Barbara, to participants of the second Arctic Resource Development and Infrastructure collaboration summit in Gambell on August 12 and 13.

This was not news to Art Ivanoff, chief executive officer of the Bering Strait Alliance LLC, the entity that hosted the event in the St. Lawrence Island community. Ivanoff addressed the group that he had helped assemble, and commented about the position that the Bering Straits region finds itself in regarding the future. "We have a real need to work across the board here, and leave no stone unturned," he said.

Ivanoff sees the Bering Sea Alliance, a group whose membership includes Wales, Saint Michael, Stebbins, Unalakleet, Gambell, Golovin, and Sitnasuak as playing a big part in that. Instead of waiting for outside agencies to come to them, Ivanoff says the BSA has gone out to forge partnerships and has "brought the process home."

That is how a collection of regional Native corporation representatives, scientists, members of federal and state government agencies, journalists, members of private corporations and even gubernatorial candidates Bill Walker and Byron Mallott, found themselves far out in the Bering Sea discussing the future of the Arctic.

The Bering Strait region has come to be known as "ground zero" due to its proximity to the rapid changes taking place there, brought on by a changing climate and increased human activity.

"Development is going to proceed with or without us," said Ivanoff. He states that this regional urgency is the driving force behind the BSA and its efforts to pursue economic opportunities for its stakeholders. At the same time, the BSA states they are committed to working diligently to protect the rich abundance of life so necessary for survival in the region.

Berkman represented Arctic Options, a U.S. National Science Foundation funded organization. It's mission is to highlight choices that can help Arctic nations balance economic, social and environmental interests across Arctic coastal marine systems.

The information he presented painted a picture of a rapidly changing world north of the 66th parallel.

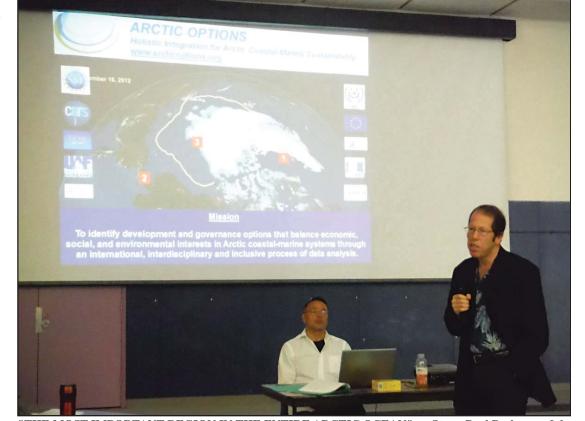

The Arctic Ocean, which 100 years ago was covered by ice year-round, is now open during the summer months, resulting in an increase of traffic in the region, said Berkman. Data shows that in 2008, 280 ships passed through the Bering Strait. That number went up to 420 last year.

Berkman said that industry is also becoming aware of the fact that travel through the Northwest Passage is 30 percent shorter than going through the Panama Canal.

A more shocking statistic, Berkman states, is in 2009, only one vessel made its way through the passage. In 2013 that number went up to 71. Berkman adds that there is even potential for future winter travel through the Northwest Passage.

Melanie Bahnke, president and CEO of Kawerak Incorporated, made the most of her opportunity to address not only some of the region's Native corporations, but also the governmental agencies about a timely response for local and regional policy making toward these rapid changes. "We are included (in the decision making processes), but we are at the back of the bus," said Bahnke. "It is time to learn to drive the bus."

Bahnke urged the governmental agencies to not just give the

"THE MOST IMPORTANT REGION IN THE ENTIRE ARCTIC OCEAN" — States Paul Berkman of the University of California at Berkeley. people of the Arctic a policy document and then give them 30 days to respond.

"Consider us as partners. Include us from the onset," she stated. Bahnke suggested that Alaska add a Native person from the Arctic to join Alaska resident Fran Ulmer, who was recently appointed to serve as a Special Advisor to Secretary of State John Kerry.

John Kerry.

Theresa Clark, land manager for Olgoonik Corporation, was invited to address the conference about the successes the Wainwright-based corporation had made through its long history of exposure to oil development in its region. "(Resource development) is here to stay, it's not going to go away," stated Clark. "Wainwright wanted a seat at the table. They have developed an Arctic Vision Concept."

Olgoonik has been able to provide its shareholders with training and employment opportunities through the development of business endeavors in oil field support, security, logistics and operations and environmental services.

Some of the agencies in attendance did pledge to do a better job including the region in policy making. But there were several instances in which the voices of the people were being heard.

Mark Fesmire, director for the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement, told of the success that the village of Kaktovik had working with Shell Oil to delay operations during the bowhead whaling Gambell resident Merlin Koonooka, who represented the 11-village membership on the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission said, "We wanted to do our own science, using traditional methods. We found out that we were right, and we have been acknowledged as authorities."

Koonooka said the AEWC has signed a series of Conflict Avoidance Agreements with the energy industry and has "in effect gotten the oil companies to agree to stay away when subsistence whale hunting is going on."

"But now," added Koonooka, "we are concerned about cruise ships and research ships and boats sailing past the Russian coast."

Addressing these concerns is at the forefront of the BSA mission according to Ivanoff. The BSA wants to have infrastructure in place to offset the possibility of oil catastrophes that increased traffic brings.

"It's not acceptable to wait for the equipment for oil response. We are pressing for regional oil depots for clean-up. It would be a mistake to not take advantage of our local work forces. Our regional residents are capable of working oil spill response."

Ivanoff states that while some 40-50 BSA shareholders have been trained in oil response, he would like to see more.

Dennis Young of the International Longshore and Warehouse

Union understands that desire. Young stated that "it is out of ground zero's controls in regards to what will impact Arctic communities. So, communities need to have a good infrastructure plan so they are ready."

Bahnke's presentation echoed that point. "We (in the Arctic) bear the most risk. We stand to lose the most if something goes wrong. But, we are also strategically located to have economic benefits."

To that end, Bahnke announced that Kawerak would be hosting a summit of Alaska Native leaders on September 15 and 16 with the goal of getting as many voices as possible together to drive policy making and planning for infrastructure

Berkman, who has met with many heads of state of the eight Arctic nations, says the risks demand urgent responses, and that infrastructure means both creating policy and building assets. "One without the other is incomplete."

The current task, according to Berkman, is "to build sustainable solutions for the future. The insight of the local indigenous people is very important information." At the conclusion of his presentation, Berkman formally invited the BSA to attend an Arctic Options conference in October.

As the Bering Strait region works toward generating policy and plans for its future, high level representatives of the eight Arctic countries – United States, Russia, Canada, Finland, Sweden, Norway, Iceland, and Denmark (which represents Greenland) – continue to meet in the forum of the Arctic Council, which was established in 1996.

In 2015 the United States will chair the Arctic Council. Berkman said this will hopefully prompt the United States to further develop its Arctic National Policy. President Obama, Berkman says, is one of the only heads of state who have not met with him and his Arctic Options group. He stressed that the national security implications are high in regards to a rapidly transforming Arctic.

Alaska Arctic Policy Commission

An update of the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission (AAPC) was given by Alaska State Representative David Guttenberg of Fairbanks. Guttenberg said that there is much for Arctic communities to think about. "If you had to ship 200 people up north for a response, where would you put them all?"

Guttenberg used the recent floods in Galena as an example for the need to create policy that helps inform agencies based out of the lower 48. "FEMA didn't even know or understand that there was no road to Galena," stated Guttenberg. "The Federal government just doesn't understand that there is no infrastructure. You are truly at ground zero in reference to organization of policy."

The AAPC is comprised of state and local officials including mayors Denise Michaels of Nome and Reggie Joule of Kotzebue, and members of industry, environmental groups and academia. The 136-page document they have produced is listed as a Preliminary Report and was submitted to the legislature in January of 2014.

"The Commission is very broad," says Guttenberg. "These are broad policy statements. It's a living document."

Residents of Nome and the Bering Straits region will have an opportunity to address the Commission in Nome on August 26, with the Aurora Inn as the tentative venue and in Kotzebue on August 27 at the Nullagvik Hotel.

One of the themes of the Arctic Resource Development and Infrastructure conference was that the region will face unique challenges as it works toward preparing for the increase in shipping traffic in the region, and for possible large-scale infrastructure projects such as a deep-water port at Port Clarence.

Michael Catsi of the Alaska Industrial Development Authority gave a presentation on how the agency financially supports rural communities and projects.

Edmund Apassingok of Gambell, Vice-Chair of the BSA, hoped to have the concerns of the BSA taken seriously by the representatives of the Coast Guard, Alaska Department of Transportation, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management and the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement. One of his main concerns was about the possible effects of invasive species.

"We have to address not only infrastructure, but education," stated Chuck Fagerstrom, representing Sitnasuak Native Corporation. Fagerstrom suggested that more attention be spent preparing students of the region for college and to serve as a local work force. "We should be demanding more from our school systems," he stated.

Iver Campbell, Vice President of the IRA Council for the Native Village of Gambell, brought up the effects the high cost of living is having on rural Alaskans and how this can impede the progress of building infrastructure. "Why don't we get cheaper prices for oil?" he asked. "Why do we have the highest prices in the nation?"

Delbert Pungowiyi, representing Kukulget Incorporated in Savoonga, was pleased to have the opportunity to address the representatives at the conference. "We would like to have an equal share, because we were the first people here," said Pungowiyi. "I see the BSA as a vehicle, a force to be at the table."

Nome's schools gear up for another great year

Nome Public Schools' business manager Paula Coffman has been working for the last year to introduce a new food program to Nome Public Schools. Recently the district signed a contract with NANA Management Services (NMS) to provide breakfast and lunch at the elementary and junior/senior high schools. Some existing staff will stay on as NPS employees; NMS is also hiring local employees who will work directly for the company. Earlier this summer the board voted to accept the contract with the food service company, which provides meals to several districts around the state.

At last Tuesday's meeting Coffman shared that the meals would be free for all Nome's students. Because NPS is now participating in both the National School Lunch Program and School Breakfast Program, and because a certain percentage of students qualify for free lunches, Coffman explained, the district qualifies for the Community Eligibility Provision (CEP).

Through CEP all Nome students will have access to free breakfast and lunch, at no additional cost to the district. "The state reimbursement allows us to provide the difference [in cost]," Coffman said, "because the free meals are at a higher reimburse-

Coffman stressed that the district still needs families to sign up for the Migrant Education program, because other services and funding are attached to the number of migrant families the district serves.

Lunch will be served starting the first day of school, and the breakfast program will begin on Monday, Au-

Superintendent Steve Gast explained how a minor change in scheduling will enable students to eat breakfast when they get to school. "We'll have buses run at the same times in the morning, but classes will start ten minutes later," Gast said. "We'll let them eat breakfast, and the school day will end 10 minutes later." Faculty, staff, and visiting adults will not enjoy free meals at the schools. For adults, the price for lunch is $6.60.

New Faces to Nome Schools

Teachers new to Nome participated in the now-annual culture camp with Tom and Bee Jay Gray at their camp near White Mountain. Again this year, Nome's new arrivals learned aspects of subsistence and cultural values, which will help them assimilate into their new communities and spark lesson ideas.

Among new staff who attended the camp are third grade teachers Barry and Sally Kinzel from Washington; Beth Longshore, Special Education, from Mat-Su; and Jodi Arnold, who is the new Reading teacher at Anvil City Science Academy and whose husband, Shawn, is the new Human Resources and Special Programs Director for the dis-new teachers this year, including two new principals. Paul Clark will lead the staff at Nome Elementary. Clark, who comes to NPS from Washington via Deering, said he is excited to meet Nome Elementary's 374 students and will begin the year by discussing parking lot and safety issues.

Because of road construction on Fifth Avenue, buses willuse an alternative route into the school. Staff will be available to help direct the new traffic flow until the construction is completed.

Harlan Heinrich, who has lived and worked in rural Alaska for 11 years, is the new principal at Nome-Beltz Jr/Sr High. Nome Public Schools also welcomes Misty Leccese, Erin Lynch, and Rebekah Albertson to Nome-Beltz; and Andrew Mauer and Patricia Murphy (a graduate of Nome-Beltz) to Nome Elementary. Aisha Talburt is the new Pre-K teacher; she will work at the Nome Preschool.

Community Engagement

Jenni Lefing from the Association of Alaska School Boards (AASB) presented the results of the 2014 School Climate and Connectedness Survey Report (SCCS) to the board last Friday. The findings included student and staff survey results from Nome Elementary, Nome-Beltz Jr/Sr high, and Anvil City Science Acad-

The survey, which is provided to districts by the Association of Alaska School Boards, aims to measure student and staff perceptions of school climate and student connectedness. The goal is to help improve the school climate for students and staff. The survey is in conjunction with the Community Engagement efforts that the district has pursued for the last few years.

This is the fourth year that NPS participated in the survey. Results show that, from 2013 to 2014 "there was a significant increase in Nome Public School District student ratings for High Expectations, School Safety, Peer Climate, Caring Adults, and Parent and Community Involvement. Student ratings were stable for School Leadership and Student Involvement and for Respectful Climate." Detailed results in several categories from the perspectives of both students and staff will be accessible in a report posted at the NPS website.

Other School News

Superintendent Steve Gast updated the board on the progress of the new teacher evaluation process. NPS will work with staff from the Marzano Center to build the new teacher evaluation, which will be implemented next school year. "The committee that decided on and made the recommendation to use Marzano model included teachers," Gast said,

"and we will continue to work with the union on the evaluation tool. We are looking forward to measuring the progress of our kids."

Gast reported that the district is still in search of two special education teachers. "There are 96 openings in special ed across the state," Gast said, "and we've been looking all summer long. Sandy Harvey [Special Education director] is working on a plan B so we can service our kids until we find someone.'

In a brief address to the board, Nome-Beltz teacher Susanne Thomas thanked the board and administration for supporting the artist in residency last April and announced her intent to "keep the spirit alive" throughout the upcoming year.

Board member Barb Amarok inquired whether the district knew how many Nome students have or are going to transfer to Mt. Edgecumbe High School in Sitka. "We won't know until we get the request for transcripts [from Edgecumbe]," Gast replied, "but we'll know more next meeting.'

The school board is scheduled to meet again August 26 for a work session and again on September 9 for their regular meeting.

"Marijuana debate needs facts not propaganda..."

By The Alaska Association of Chiefs of Police

In past weeks marijuana legalization proponents have blithely told the public that while Alaska already has the highest use of marijuana in the country there "is no problem" on the roads because of it. We call that whistling in the graveyard. First, the law enforcement community believes that the 50 lives lost and the hundreds of people injured in motor vehicle crashes during 2013 in Alaska are too many, and we think the friends and families of those killed and maimed would agree. Secondly, while the proponents' statements are presented as if they are fact, the truth is they are generally unsupported opinion not challenged by the press. Toxicology (testing of blood) is necessary to determine if marijuana impairment is a factor in a crash. Since toxicology is not universally reported on crash victims in Alaska, it is impossible to know what percentage of current Alaskan crashes are marijuana related, but a study (cited below) of severely injured drivers admitted to a major trauma center in Maryland showed more than 1 in 4 to be under the influence of marijuana. It is wishful thinking to say that marijuana is not currently causing problems on Alaska highways.

Similarly, statements being made about crash experiences in Washington and Colorado since marijuana has been legalized are purely anecdotal. Certified reporting of crash statistics generally has a lag time of about a year because of the time it takes to collect and tabulate data from every geographic locality. Complete and accurate data showing the effect of marijuana legalization on traffic crashes in Colorado and Washington likely won't be available until mid to late 2015 - long after Alaskan voters decide to accept or reject the proposed legalization initiative on November's ballot. Any current year crash data conclusions professed prior to that time are inconclusive and speculative.

flux. While the death count is relatively certain, injury counts are not yet completely tabulated and must be projected based on prior year data. While contemporaneous crash data contains uncertainties and can't provide a basis for conclusion, we feel recent studies from around the country paint a clear picture of what we can expect if marijuana is legalized in Alaska:

• Drugs that may affect driving were detected in one of every seven weekend nighttime drivers in California during the summer of 2012. In that first California statewide roadside survey of alcohol and drug use by drivers, 14 percent of drivers tested positive for drugs, 7.4 percent of drivers tested positive for alcohol, and just as many tested positive for marijuana as for alcohol. ("California Roadside Survey Finds Twice as Many Weekend Nighttime Drivers Test Positive for Other Drugs as for Alcohol: Marijuana as Likely as Alcohol." CESARFAX, Col. 21, 48, December www.cesar.umd.edu/cesar/vol21/21-48.pdf)

• In a 2007 National Roadside Survey of alcohol and drug use by drivers, a random sample of weekend nighttime drivers across the United States found that 16.3 percent of the drivers tested positive for drugs, compared to 2.2 percent of drivers with blood alcohol concentrations at or above the legal limit. Drugs were present more than 7 times more frequently as alcohol. (DuPont, Robert. "National Survey Confirms that Drugged Driving is Significantly More Widespread than Drunk Driving." Commentary, Institute for Behavior and Health, July 17, 2009. page 1. http://www.ibhinc.org)

• In states where there has been a large increase in 'medical" marijuana cardholders, DUI arrests involving marijuana skyrocketed, as have traffic fatalities where marijuana was found in the system of one of the drivers. Enforcement is a big mess!

We have Tribal Leaders who get away with corruption and Bureau of Indian Affairs ignoring complaints! Also The Alaska Native Medical Center and The Yukon Kuskokwim need to start respecting our people regarding our health. There are other hospitals serving a whole bunch of people and patients are seen in 15 minutes or less in the emergency room, please see what they are doing so you can do the same! To wait hours is an emergency itself.

I love the State of Alaska and our Tribal Villages, as do you all. Let's stop talking and do some fixing, we are all Americans and need to think of our fellow Americans who defend our freedom and stand up to corrupted people in our systems of Tribal, State, Federal and get them out. We need honest people to work for us, we are on the right path, I sure love the commercial of kids who tell us to stand up and speak out against

Thank you for your time and I'm telling this in a good, forgiving heart. Let's all be good to each other no matter what color or race, we are all in the same boat and are blessed to be living in a free country, we should not take it for granted.

God bless Alaska and The United

Saying It Sincerely

By Pastor Charles Brower Community United Methodist Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

Those of us who grew up in small rural communities know the intricacies of relationships. It is no laughing matter that half of all marriages in the church are ending in divorce. This message is not just about marriage relationships, but all relationships. The life of Joseph gives us an excellent example in the dos and don'ts of restoring relationships. Learning and applying relational skills is vitally important because God made us to live in relationship with others. When Adam was alone in the garden God saw that it was not good for him to be alone. We can only live in relationships. We need each other.

During this very emotional time Joseph called his brothers to come close to him rather than pushing them away. Too often when people wrong us we respond by pushing them away. Surely you can see that we will never restore a relationship with someone we are pushing away. If we are to restore relationships, we must begin drawing close to those who have hurt us.

Healthy relationships are vital to our very lives. When Joseph decided to reveal his true identity and confront his brothers years after they sold him into slavery, he first cleared the room so that it could be done in private. There was a great deal of wisdom in that move. If someone has wronged you in some way the last thing that you should do is broadcast that everywhere.

Joseph didn't buy into the philosophy that real men don't cry because when he confronted his brothers he wept openly and loudly. He didn't suppress or bottle up his feelings, but he let them out in a healthy manner. If our emotions are bottled up they'll eventually blow up.

Joseph calmed his brother's fears. Joseph tells them that they do not need to be distressed. The greatest comfort that we can give to someone who has wronged us is forgiveness.

The Bible says, "If anyone serves, he should do it with the strength God provides, so that in all things God may be praised through Jesus Christ" in 1 Peter 4:11. When we are tempted to think that we don't have the power to help those who have harmed us remember that God is our source of strength.

Joseph and his brothers threw their arms around each other and kissed one another. Similar to the celebration that took place when the prodigal son was restored to his father, or the celebration that takes place in heaven every time a sinner is restored to a right relationship with God. It is a biblical principal that restoration results in celebration. It is that celebration that makes the hard work of restoration worthwhile.

Attention Nome Offshore Miners

Failure to comply with the following stipulations is a violation and may result in revocation of your DNR mining permit.

Offshore mining operators using suction dredge and mechanical placer mining equipment must implement the following buffer around set nets.

- Miners must maintain a 300 foot buffer from any part of a set net; if your operation uses an 8 inch or larger nozzle or is a mechanical placer mining operation (e.g. excavator with a wash plant on a barge or vessel), you must maintain a 500 foot buffer from set nets.
- As a general rule, all mining is prohibited year-round within the 0.5 mile distance (radius) from any anadromous river mouth. Additionally, for 10 inch and larger suction dredge or mechanical placer mining operations, such as an excavator on a barge, mining within the 1 mile distance (radius) of any anadromous river mouth between the annual dates of June 1 July 15 is prohibited.

Exceptions to these mining prohibitions for the following anadromous rivers are as follows:

- o Mining offshore of the mouths of the Snake River, Penny River and Cripple River, between the annual dates of September 15 to December 1, is allowed to a distance of 500 feet from the mouth of these rivers.
- o At no time from September 15 to December 1, may any mining operation be closer than 500 feet to these three river mouths.
- For questions or to report violations please contact the DNR field office (907) 443-3546.

Because toxicology results are not universally reported for Alaskan crashes, no empirical data exists which would lead us to expect a different result here.

- In a study of seriously injured drivers admitted to a Maryland Level-1 shock-trauma center, 65.7 percent were found to have positive toxicology results for alcohol and/or drugs. Almost 51 percent of the total tested positive for illegal drugs. A total of 26.9 percent of those drivers tested positive for marijuana. (DuPont, Robert. "National Survey Confirms that Drugged Driving is Significantly More Widespread than Drunk Driving." Commentary, Institute for Behavior and Health, July 17, 2009. page 1. http://www..ib-hinc.org)
- The National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws (NORML) has called for a science-based educational campaign targeting drugged driving behavior. In a January 2008 report titled, Cannabis and Driving, it is noted that motorists should be discouraged from driving if they have recently smoked cannabis and should never operate a motor vehicle after having consumed both marijuana and alcohol. The report also calls for the development of roadside, cannabis-sensitive technology to better assist law enforcement in identifying drivers who may be under the influence of pot. (Cannabis and Driving: A Scientific and Rational Review." Armentano, Paul. NORML/NORML Foundation. January 10, 2008. http://normal.org/index.cfm?Group_ID=7475 for article and http://normal.org/index.cfm?Group_ID=7459 for the full report)

Drugged driving is a public health concern because it impairs motor skills, reaction time, and judgment; and it puts not only the driver at risk, but also passengers and others who share the road. Even low doses of marijuana moderately impair cognitive and psychomotor tasks associated with driving, while severe driving impairment is observed with high doses, chronic use and use in combination with low doses of alcohol. The more difficult and unpredictable the task, the more likely marijuana will impair performance.

The Alaska Association of Chiefs of Police hopes the people of Alaska will base their opinion on well researched, science-based facts about marijuana, and not rely on anecdotal evidence and biased propaganda. The safety of Alaska's streets and highways is at stake.

Court recruits for new magistrate judge

By Diana Haecker

The Alaska Court system is looking for a new magistrate in Nome as current Magistrate Judge and Standing Master Brooke Alowa is set to leave Nome by the end of this month. "I had the opportunity to take a position as chief of enforcement for the Alaska State Commission on Human Rights," Alowa told the Nome Nugget. The Commission is tasked to identify and eradicate instances of discrimination in Alaska. Although sad to leave Nome for the big city of Anchorage, Alowa said she is proud to be going to work for the commission and being part of a team dedicated to ensure equality and justice in Alaska.

Alowa worked as an attorney for the Nome Law firm Lewis & Thomas between 2007 and 2010.

She then worked for ten months as the supervising attorney of the Office of Public Advocacy in Bethel. From 2010 until Dec. 2012 Alowa was the Magistrate Judge in Kotzebue.

The Alaska Court System began recruiting for the position of Magistrate Judge.

A magistrate serves under the presiding judge of the judicial district and area court administrator and is tasked to set bail, conduct small claims trials and misdemeanor and minor offense arraignments and trials, issue warrants, emergency child proceedings and DV matters.

According to Area Court Administrator Tracey Buie, a recruitment bulletin has been issued and is posted on the State of Alaska website, the Court System's website and the Alaska Bar Assocation's website. The deadline for applications closes on August 18.

Presiding Judge Michael Jeffery will hire Alowa's successor. A hiring team is part of the process to narrow the field of candidates and to aid Judge Jeffery in making a final se-

In the meantime, local Superior Court Judge Timothy Dooley will absorb some of the workload. Dooley's predecessor Judge Ben Esch will fill in for a short time. Other judicial officers in courts in Unalakleet, Barrow and Kotzebue also will

U.S. Sec. of Commerce, NOAA administrator visit Nome

By Diana Haecker

Last week's visit by U.S. Secretary of Commerce Penny Pritzker and the NOAA administrator Dr. Kathryn Sullivan continued the series of federal dignitaries descending on Nome to learn about Arctic realities such as increased maritime traffic and climate change.

Only a chosen few were privy to the visits, to meet with the Secretary and to discuss concerns concerning region-specific issues.

During two roundtable meeting Sec. Pritzker met with Nome business and Native Corporation leaders and Alaska NOAA employees.

A request by the Nome Nugget for a short interview with Secretary Pritzker was denied.

According to Senator Mark Begich's press secretary, Sec. Pritzker was on vacation, traveling on her private jet with her husband.

The Secretary was accompanied by Dr. Kathryn Sullivan, Under Secretary of Commerce for Oceans and Atmosphere and administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, a bureau under the Dept. of Commerce.

Dr. Sullivan was available for a short interview with the Nugget.

According to Dr. Sullivan, Sec. Pritzker and her entourage received a tour of the Nome Small Boat Harbor and the Port by Joy Baker and Harbormaster Lucas Stotts.

Next was a meeting at the Bering Straits Native Corporation building with coastal and village leaders, said Dr. Sullivan. In the afternoon, another roundtable discussion took place with local business and economic leaders. "Those are just first snippets but the conversations were fruitfully wide ranging," said Dr. Sullivan.

The purpose of Sec. Pritzker's first trip to Alaska was to familiarize her with Alaskan trade, investment, innovation and environmental issues. Dr. Sullivan said that from Pritzker's confirmation hearing onward, people pressed the Secretary to visit Alaska and learn firsthand about Alaskan issues in order to participate meaningfully on presidential-level conversations as the U.S. assumes chairmanship of the Arctic

A statement from the City's finance office calls for "all individuals, firms and other business entities must register with the City Clerk's office before making sales, making rentals or rendering services within the City of Nome.'

City administration voiced a need to tighten up enforcement of sales tax reporting

Additionally, cutting exemptions and new sales taxes pose a considerable pot of money to fund City services. In 2013, the City missed out on around $700,000 due to required sales tax exemptions and $1.2 million on discretionary exemptions.

By law, the City must exempt city,

However, up for grabs is sales tax that could come from axing discretionary exemptions granted by the City. The City could put 40 churches and nonprofit organizations-Kawerak, Inc., Nome Community Center, Nome Preschool Association, NACTEC and N.E.S.T. homeless shelter back on the sales tax rolls.

The Council tasked City's finance officer Julie Liew with bringing back numbers to show the financial effects of reducing sales tax exemptions for a future work session.

To avoid claims of favorism, Councilman Matt Cully was for doing away with all discretionary exemptions across the board and to take another look at restoring exemptions when the City budget returns to health.

Councilman Tom Sparks said he would like to see more figures in the attempt to fatten coffers with cancelled sales tax exemptions.

Liew said that cutting exemptions could net around $800,000 for a

Sink hole detected at NBHS

By Diana Haecker

In the first few days of school, Nome Beltz students had to use a side entrance to the Nome Beltz High School because of a large sinkhole that developed dangerously close to the main entrance.

On Monday, NBHS maintenance personnel detected the sinkhole near the concrete walkway next to the school entrance. NBHS Maintenance Foreman Bill Potter said the hole grew overnight from just a small depression to a gaping hole. He presumed the heavy rain on Tuesday widened the hole.

Potter rented a backhoe to explore the reason for the ever-widening hole. After digging three feet into the ground, the gravel began to cascade and collapse a wider surface, Potter said. He discovered a brick wall forming a well five feet in diameter at a depth of about four feet. "The dry well was capped with rotten lumber that caused the cave-in," he said.

The dry well is about 12 to 16 feet deep and serves as a mechanism to drain rainwater collected from the building's roof into the ground to dissipate. Potter said there are six or seven more of these dry wells on campus, but only the location of one other is known.

Potter said the school district will bring up an engineer to assess the situation and to decide on a plan of ac-

In the meantime, the area is cordoned off to keep people from falling into the abyss.

Potter said on Wednesday not a single foot of orange fencing was commercially available in the local stores and that if need be, he'd build a plywood fence around the hole to keep people from falling in.

Letters -

Dear Nancy,

I would like to take this time to recognize the fantastic work Tumet has done on the city roads here in Stebbins, Alaska. The road structure and the integrity of the roads are greatly improved. Although it may be too early to tell, but there is next to no potholes, at least that I have seen. I'm delighted to also see that Tumet's road workers have spread grass seed along the road just outside of town. It makes for a metropolis sight to see grass along the road, reminding me of the urban stretches of road in Anchorage. Thank you to all the hard workers at Tumet for improving our road system here in Stebbins.

Dear Editor: Making Progress for Alaska's Veterans

Supporting veterans should be a bipartisan issue, and I'm concerned about some who are trying to politicize military service. The fact is that we're making major progress on improving care for Alaska veterans.

In Alaska, the Veterans Administration backlog has declined from 900 to 50, a major improvement. The reality is that VA response times have improved over the last few years. Improvements in VA management weren't an accident: Senator Begich and our Congressional delegation has put a lot of pressure on the VA to improve care for Alaska veterans.

In addition to reducing the VA backlog, Alaska veterans have seen the most dramatic expansion in health care in years as we gained access to more clinics. As a result of a VA/IHS partnership initiated by Senator Begich, now Alaska vets can get care closer to home. There are 28 IHS clinics that now are open to veterans, meaning that more veterans in rural Alaska can get care in their hometowns. There are also new partnerships with more clinics in urban areas like Anchorage.

Just a couple weeks ago, Congress passed bipartisan legislation making these Alaska reforms the model for national improvements to veterans care. Senator Begich and other members of the Alaska delegation supported this important bill, and it passed despite the gridlock that has hurt Congress.

Reducing the VA backlog and opening dozens of new clinics to Alaska's veterans means that our care for those who have served our country is better than ever.

Respectfully, Barb Angaiak Bethel AK 99559

This past week has been a wonderful beginning of the new school year. We are off to a great start with 259 students enrolled. I have had an opportunity to meet some of you and I am looking forward to meeting more of you as the school year progresses.

A group of Sami Reindeer herders from Finland was at Nome-Beltz for an assembly on Tuesday to give a presentation to the students and staff regarding their cultural practice of herding reindeer. This group is comprised of vocational school students studying in the "Reindeer Herder Curriculum" and they are here to share part of their culture as they gain a better understanding of ours.

If you come by the school, please stop in my office and say hello...I'm looking forward to meeting you.

Stealth Mode

Last week a series of federal officials descended on Nome. The U.S. Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of Transportation, the head of the Department of Energy and head of NOAA were in town. Sen. Begich was also in town. They spend public money to get here, but go into stealth mode to maintain secrecy and avoid the hoi polloi who pay their salaries.

The Secretary of Commerce had a security escort from the Nome Police Department as she toured the Nome Port facility - but she made it clear that she was on vacation and wanted absolutely no photos. Go figure. The Nugget considered offering a 6-pack to any Nomeite who could provide a usable cell phone photo. The head of the Dept. of Energy held some kind of meeting at Old St. Joe's. There were only six people in the audience. They failed to tell Nomeites they were coming to Nome.

Politicians should be forced to reimburse the government for money spent on their junkets. With whom did they meet? Why the secrecy? What do they expect to accomplish by snubbing the local citizens. Do they realize how rude they are? Do they care? - N.L.M.-

Coast Guard rescues man off icebreaker Araon

A Coast Guard MH-60 MH-60 Jayhawk helicopter medevaced a crewmember suffering from a head injury from the South Korean research icebreaker Araon 250 miles north of Barrow, on Wednesday August 20.

The Coast Guard 17th District command center watch standers received the medevac request from the crew of the Araon Tuesday afternoon. The icebreaker crew began heading south to get within range of the Jayhawk helicopters in Barrow. Command center watch standers also contacted the crew of the Coast Guard cutter Healy to support communications with helicopter crews for the flight.

Once the Araon closed the distance to land, two Jayhawk helicopter crews at the forward operating location Barrow launched to rendezvous with the icebreaker. The aircrews arrived on-scene, safely hoisted the injured man and an accompanying translator, and returned to Barrow.

"Maritime activity in the Arctic has steadily increased during the past several years, and this emergency situation highlights the importance of having a Coast Guard forward operating location in the region," said Capt. Joseph Deer, chief of incident management, Coast Guard 17th District. "Our ability to respond and effectively carry out rescue missions relies heavily on minimizing distances, honing communications capability and strengthening our maritime domain awareness in our northernmost area of responsibility."

Weather on scene was reported as 35 degrees, 17 mph winds and heavy fog.

Army strike weapon explodes after take off

On Monday a test rocket launched from the Kodiak Launch Complex was destroyed soon after lift-off, according to a Defense Department press release.

The Department of Defense said in a statement that shortly after midnight Alaska time, the U.S. Army Space and Missile Defense Command/Army Forces Strategic Command conducted a flight test of the Advanced Hypersonic Weapon from the Kodiak Launch Complex in Alaska. But something went wrong and the test was aborted. "Due to an anomaly, the test was terminated near the launch pad shortly after liftoff to ensure public safety. There were no injuries to any personnel," the release read. "Program officials are conducting an extensive investigation to determine the cause of the flight anomaly." The test was conducted as part of a program to develop and test conventional military technology. KMXT reports that eyewitnesses described the explosion as a loud and brightly burning fire at the Kodiak Launch Complex, about 25 miles from Kodiak.

Institute of the North gives Sustainable Arctic Award to Alaska Clean Seas

The Institute of the North presented the 2014 Robert O. Anderson Sustainable Arctic Award to Alaska Clean Seas. Alaska Clean Seas is an oil spill response organization. A press release from ION said Alaska Clean Seas has consistently demonstrated the ability to achieve the highest environmental and safety standards. In order to ensure the highest levels of oil spill response both in the Arctic and around the world, ACS coordinates with other top-level organizations to collaborate and share arctic and cold weather response capabilities.

As interest in oil spill prevention and response activities in both the U.S. Arctic and globally has dramatically increased, ACS has raised the bar locally, nationally and internationally. The ION press release said, the ACS organization has well served its community, member companies, supported regulatory agencies and improved partnerships with non-governmental organizations. Safely and successfully meeting all challenges in a unique and fragile summer environment then a harsh, often dangerous, and lengthy winter climate, ACS consistently exceeds expectations from all stakeholders.

mine developments in British Columbia near Alaska's southeast border rapidly advance. The request came in the wake of the Mt. Pollev mine disaster in B.C. and with the Canadian province's approval of a large-scale mine called KSM (Kerr-Sulphurets-Mitchell) near Alaska. KSM is one of several Canadian mine projects, located near international rivers flowing from B.C. into Southeast Alaska, that threaten Alaska's multi-billion-dollar seafood and visitor industries and pose unacceptable risks to the environment, according to a statement from the

The catastrophic accident at the Mt. Polley mine underscores the risk Southeast Alaska faces from largescale B.C. mine development, including five acid-generating projects located in the Unuk, Stikine and Taku River watersheds, some of Southeast Alaska's most productive and lucrative salmon-bearing rivers.

The five mines are part of a larger mineral development push by B.C. Premier Christy Clark who has pledged to create eight new mines and expand nine more by next year.

The newly constructed Red Chris mine, located in the Stikine River watershed, upstream from the Alaska communities of Wrangell and Petersburg, is set to start operations soon. Red Chris is owned by Imperial Metals, the same company that operates Mt. Polley, and is currently being blockaded by citizens of the Tahltan First Nation.

The tailings dam breach at Mt. Polley unleashed an estimated 2.6 billion gallons of mine wastewater and 6 million cubic vards of sand. contaminated with tons of copper, nickel, arsenic and lead, into waterways leading to the Fraser River, one of Canada's biggest salmon producers. The massive Aug. 4 spill coincided with the annual return of an estimated 1.5 million salmon to the Fraser River.

"This failure may affect salmon stocks managed under the Pacific Salmon Treaty. A similar failure at mines proposed near the Unuk, Stikine and Taku Rivers would directly affect fishery stocks upon Council next year. "This is a trip oriented around giving her that first exposure to Alaska, its people, communities and its issues," said Sullivan.

Topping the list of those issues are of course climate change induced environmental changes, coastal erosion issues and a growing economical interest in the Arctic. Asked why Sec. Pritzker was not available to hear from the public during her trip to Alaska, Dr. Sullivan answered that time constraints prohibited any mingling with the general public.

"We had limitations on time because of all the other commitments and obligations on her calendar," said Dr. Sullivan. "We worked as a team as well as we could to try to bring a collection of voices from different sectors to her, but we did not do any general town hall meetings or grassroots public engagements. That first look just didn't allow that," said Dr. Sullivan.

After leaving Nome, the Secretary was slated to spend some time in the "bush" south of the Alaska Range and at the Kenai Peninsula.

Prior to arriving in Nome, the Secretary and Dr. Sullivan visited Anchorage and held roundtable discussions with business leaders, the Alaska Chamber of Commerce and Native Corporations. There, they also visited the Alaska Weather, Water and Ice Center, which is the National Weather Service's main operations center in Anchorage.

The Dept. of Commerce's website says the Secretary discussed workforce development challenges, the need for infrastructure development to seize the economic opportunities of a changing Arctic and the importance of making it easier for visitors to enter the United States. "With more than 1.9 million visitors during fiscal year 2014, Alaska's expanding travel and tourism industry is critical to economic growth and job creation in the state," the website reads.

During her Anchorage visit, Secretary Pritzker announced that the Commerce Department is getting ready to reopen the U.S. Export Assistance Center in Alaska in the coming weeks. USEACs around the country connect U.S. companies with international buyers, provide them with market intelligence and trade counseling, and facilitate business matchmaking and commercial diplomacy support.

budget that relies heavily on sales

"Sales tax from private businesses is keeping the doors open," City Manager Josie Bahnke commented.

This year's spending plan calls for taking half a million dollars from City reserves to balance the budget.

Councilmembers pointed out the City budget also gives contributions to some of the organizations excused from paying sales tax.

There are other activities that could be added to the sales tax payer's list—medical, banking, and gold miners' dredges. Many dredges miss paying tax because they are not in Nome on Jan. 1.

This could be cured by a prorated tax for the mining season, Chandler suggested.

The City could more rigidly enforce some tax measures on the books, according to Chandler.

Take rent for instance, on which the renter could be billed, as rent was a sale, said Chandler.

Discussion conceded that the landlords would include a sales tax in the rent with an increase in the monthly payment.

The meeting was a work session, so the Council did not vote on the tax issues, which would take more research, attorney time and penciling in figures.

Chandler will put together a package on the City's revenue policies to help the City with administering tax codes and standardizing procedures to more efficiently collect and abate substantial cases of tax cheating.

The Council met in regular session following the work session. They unanimously voted to release $620,000 to pay architects ECI/Hyer to go ahead on the Richard Foster Building to house the City's library and museum as well as space to lease to the Beringia Science and Culture Center. The money will reward a quote from ECI/Hyer for the bid phase, construction administration, furniture and equipment assistance and design portions of the project.

In January, the Council approved ECI/Hyer as architects for the project which commercial and recreational fishermen depend, as well as the subsistence and cultural needs of the Tlingit, Haida and Tsimshian people of my state," wrote Sen. Mark Begich in a letter to Sec. Kerry this month.

The budget still needs around $300,000 for the City portion—library and museum, and $1.2 million for the Kawerak's Beringia rental space, Kendall Gee of ECI/Hyer told the Council.

The Mt. Polley disaster "has renewed the specter of environmental impacts from large-scale mineral developments in Canada that are located near transboundary rivers," wrote Sen. Lisa Murkowski to Kerry on Aug. 8. "This incident should compel the State Department to evaluate additional steps that may be warranted to safeguard U.S. interests."

Congressman Don Young also called for Kerry's help, specifically on the proposed KSM mine near Ketchikan. KSM is a massive gold and copper open-pit mine project about 19 miles north of Alaska's border that has already received B.C. provincial approval. The Canadian federal government is currently evaluating the project and is expected to make a decision this fall.

Alaskans, including three state commissioners and several Alaska legislators, and the Petersburg Vessel Owners Association, have called on the Canadian federal government to elevate the environmental review of KSM to the highest possible level, a process called a Panel Review

Since last fall when the KSM mine underwent provincial review, more than 1,000 Alaskans have weighed in with public comments, asking for more scrutiny of KSM, as well as the other transboundary mineral developments, and for State Department intervention. Many have cited the Boundary Waters Treaty between the U.S. and Canada as a tool Kerry could use to address the threats to Alaska imposed by the B.C. mines. The treaty states "that the waters herein defined as boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other

Primary Elections: Repeal of SB 21 ballot measure defeated

By Diana Haecker

Unofficial results from the August 19 primary election revealed the ballot measure SB 21 has been defeated.

According to preliminary and unofficial election results. Alaskan voters rejected Ballot Measure 1, which proposed the repeal of Senate Bill 21. Alaska Governor Sean Parnell pushed the bill, which overhauled the way oil and gas production is taxed in Alaska.

Although the state and most of the regional communities voted "no" on the repeal proposition, Nome voters felt that SB 21 should be repealed.

Statewide, 52.2 percent of Alaskans voted to keep the current oil tax system and 47.7 percent voting to repeal. The difference was an estimated 7,000 votes.

In Nome, 713 votes were cast and 474 voted "Yes" to repeal SB 21, 239 voted "No". The majority of other Bering Strait/Norton Sound villages voted "No" on Ballot measure 1. The communities of Wales, St. Mary's, Shishmaref, Elim and Little Diomede voted "Yes" to repeal SB

A coalition of six Native Corporations including Bering Strait Native Corporation opposed the repeal of SB 21 and ran highly visible ad campaigns in rural Alaska, drowning out most of the efforts by the campaign to repeal SB 21. Most voters in the Northwest Arctic Borough and the Arctic North Slope Borough voted the measure down with 63 percent voting "No."

US Senate race

Democrat and incumbent of Alaska's second seat in the United States Senate Mark Begich had not much in terms of competition and won the Democratic primary with 351 votes in Nome.

This trend held true for all District 39 communities, where the vast majority of Democrats voted for Be-

In the Republican primary, voters chose between former Alaska Attorney General and Commissioner of DNR Dan Sullivan, Fairbanks lawyer and Tea Party politician Joe Miller, current Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell and John Jaramillo. Sullivan won statewide. In Nome, there was a tie: 89 voters voted for Treadwell and 89 for Dan Sullivan.

Joe Miller received 64 votes in

US Representative

Forrest Dunbar won the Democratic/ Libertarian primary against Frank Vondersaar (Dem) and Jim McDermott (Lib) with 1,142 votes district-wide. Dunbar, a young political newcomer, visited Nome twice.

Dunbar received 249 votes in Nome and also carried the region. Statewide, Dunbar received 63 percent of the vote

On the Republican side, incumbent Republican Don Young, running for his 22nd term as the one and only Congressman for Alaska, won the primary against Republican challengers David Seaward, David Dohner, and John Cox. In Nome, 184 votes cast their ballot for Young. Statewide, Young received 64,832 votes, or 74.37 percent of the Republican vote.

Governor

Out of a total of 52,118 votes statewide, Democratic candidate Byron Mallott carried the Democratic primary with 34,854 or nearly 67 percent against Libertarian Carolyn Clift and Democrat Phil Stoddard. In Nome, 358 Democrats cast their vote for Mallott. Regionwide, Mallott overwhelmingly took the vote with 1,485 votes. On the Republican ticket, incumbent Governor Sean Parnell was challenged by Republicans Gerald Heikes, Russ Millette and Brad Snowden. Parnell prevailed as the Republican choice for governor. Parnell received 164 votes in Nome, 734 votes regionwide and 65,634 votes or 75.5 percent statewide.

Independent gubernatorial candidate Bill Walker did not appear on the primary election ballot.

Lt. Governor

Anchorage Mayor Dan Sullivan, not to be confused with Dan Sullivan, the DNR Commissioner and Republican candidate for the U.S. Senate, ran for the Lt. Governor's office. In the Republican primary, Sullivan got 60,802 votes, or 70.5

On the Democratic ticket, Hollis French won statewide with 33,094 or nearly 62 percent of the vote. In Nome, however, voters chose a familiar face with Robert Williams, a former Nome-Beltz math teacher. Williams carried district 39 with 994 votes - French only got 763. In Nome, Williams beat French by one vote and he received 181 votes.

Williams received 13,722 or nearly 26 percent of the statewide

The voter turn out in Nome averaged 28.8 percent. In Nome, 2,533 voters are registered but only 736 cards were cast.

Statewide, 2,728 votes were cast out of a possible 8,744 registered votes, marking a s turnout of under 32 percent.

No pathogens found in dead Kobuk River salmon

By Diana Haecker

The large die-off of salmon at the Kobuk River that occurred by the end of the week after August 15 has abated, according to Susan Georgette, U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service outreach coordinator in Kotzebue. Georgette assessed the situation last Monday, flying along the Kobuk and other tributaries and boated to Kiana again on Thursday to take stock of the situation again.

Reports of a massive fish die-off reached Alaska Department of Fish and Game and USFWS offices starting August 14 and 15. "There are still a lot of dead fish in the river around Kiana, but they don't appear to be fresh carcasses," Georgette said.

The carcasses Georgette observed in the middle of the week were from the die-off that peaked on the prior weekend. In Kiana, residents have commented on having never seen this many chum salmon – dead and alive – in the river.

Georgette managed to send samples of the fish carcasses to the Alaska Department of Fish and Game's Fish Pathology Lab. They ran standard tests for bacteria and viruses. It can take as long as one week to over a month to get test results.

The pathology lab also did a necropsy of the fish. "They said it appeared to be a healthy salmon, close to spawning," Georgette wrote in an email. "The one interesting thing they found was algae on the gills and skin. They said there would have to be a lot of algae in the water to stick to fish."

According to the lab, algae on the fish's gills and skin supports the idea that low dissolved oxygen in the water caused the salmon die-off.

Algae blooms consume lots of oxygen in the water, and combining that with a huge return of salmon could have led to enough oxygen depletion to kill salmon, said Georgette in an email to the Nome Nugget.

Just like in Nome and the Bering

Strait region, Kotzebue and the Kobuk River valley saw sunny warm weather in August, which increases the growth of algae and other plant life in the water.

Georgette said that she and her coworker, Brittany Sweeney, collected water samples. They are looking for an adequate laboratory that could test the water samples for algae. Ambler and perhaps other upper Kobuk villages also did water sampling in their area, she said.

During the boat ride above Kiana, they stopped at one sandbar where they counted 284 salmon carcasses in a little less than half a mile.

Samples also have been sent in to a federal pathology lab. ADF&G sport fish personnel conducted a survey in the Noatak River and reported no fish die-off there, but lots of fish, said Nome's Jim Menard, ADF&G Area Manager for Commercial Fisheries Division for the Arctic-Kotzebue and Norton Sound-Port Clarence Areas.

Alaska State Trooper Karl Erickson retires

Alaska State Trooper Karl Erickson retired on Aug. 1 in the same town where he served as a police officer at the beginning of his 26-year career in law enforcement. Erickson graduated from Alaska Law Enforcement Training session No. 5. He worked with the Unalakleet Police Department for two years, and was eventually selected as its chief of police. There he decided to join the Alaska State Trooper ranks.

Trooper Recruit Erickson was a member of Academy Recruit Class No. 40 that graduated in August of 1990. He served in Anchorage, first as a patrol trooper, and then with the General Investigations Unit until he transferred to "C" Detachment's Kotzebue post in January of 1992. He stayed for six years. Trooper Erickson was named "C" Detachment Trooper of the Year in 1995. In July of 1998, he transferred to "E" Detachment's Soldotna post where he was a field training officer. From 2000-2001, he was a member of "E" Detachment's Tracking Team that hunted down fugitives on the Kenai Peninsula.

In July of 2001, he was promoted to sergeant and took the supervisor's position at "B" Detachment's Glennallen post. He then took the same position at "C" Detachment's Kotzebue post in 2002. When a trooper post was reinstated in Unalakleet, Erickson transferred to one of the two trooper positions in 2006. He will remain in Unalakleet after his retirement where he has many friends and family.

At his retirement ceremony, members of the community filled the community hall to show their appreciation for a job well done for the citizens of Unalakleet. His fellow troopers wish Karl Erickson a fond farewell and all the best in his future endeavors.

Norton Sound and Kotzebue fish report for late-August

By Jim Menard, ADF&G

SALMON: Norton Sound

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest figures this season are: 280 kings, 104,000 chums, 180,000 pinks, 370 reds and 90,000 silvers.

The Norton Sound silver run is much better than forecast and has been showing great strength on the backside of the run. The department silver salmon forecast for the commercial fishery harvest was 60,000 to 90,000 fish and this year's harvest may top 100,000 silvers for only the sixth time in history. Late season projections show that commercial harvest may still squeak out a top 5

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through mid-August was 60 kings, 146 reds, 31,800 chums, 82,200 pinks and 48,700 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest is on track for a top 10 finish.

North River Tower - Camp J.B. -Escapement goals: King 1,200-2,600; Chum-No goal established; Pink 25,000; Silver 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal) - cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count for 12 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26 with half day counts and full day counts beginning on July 29. Cumulative counts through August 23 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,300 kings, 11,500 chums, 144,000 pinks and 3,000 silvers. The average historical third point of the silver run past the tower has been August 24.

Unalakleet River Floating Weir -No weir escapement goals yet established - cooperative project; Fish & Game, Native Village of Unalakleet, United States BLM and NSEDC. Major funding provided by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service - Office of Subsistence Management.

The weir crew was unable to count for nearly six days because of high water and full day counts resumed on July 27. Cumulative counts through August 23 should be considered minimal for all species and were 1,000 kings, 54,000 chums, 1.2 million pinks, 200 reds and 40,000 silvers. Last year was the only year counting continued this late in August and the count was 25,500 silvers.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 16 kings, 39 reds, 28,700 chums, 33,000 pinks and 16,400 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest ranks seventh highest.

Shaktoolik Sonar/Tower - No escapement goals yet established - cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count since July 13 due to high water, but did get the sonar unit set back up to count on August 4. Cumulative counts through August 21 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,000 kings, 53,000 chums, 423,000 pinks and 5,500 sil-

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 70 kings, 15 reds, 13,000 chums, 28,000 pinks and 8,500 silvers. After big catches this past week the silver harvest blew past the previous record of 5,485 silvers harvested last year.

Elim Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 98 kings, 129 reds, 16,800 chums, 28,200 pinks and 12,500 silvers. The silver harvest is a record surpassing the previous record harvest of 10,180 silvers in

Kwiniuk River Tower - Camp Joel - Escapement goals: King 300-

550; Chum 11,500 - 23,000; Pink 8,400; Silver 650-1,300 (aerial survey goal). Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 23 were 429 kings, 40,000 chums, 326,000 pinks and 11,600 silvers. The silver count only trails the record run of 2006 by 2,000 silvers and there was no commercial fishing in 2006 because of a lack of a market. The average historical third quarter point for silvers past the tower is August 27.

Golovin Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 28 kings, 44 reds, 13,500 chums, 7,900 pinks and 3,300 silvers. The silver harvest ranks fourth greatest. The record harvest was 5,586 silvers in 2010 and last year's harvest was second best with 5,362

Fish River Tower - No escapement goals established - cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count for 11 days because of high water and resumed counting on July 26. Cumulative counts through August 23 should be considered minimal for all species and were 900 kings, 45,000 chums, 220,000 pinks, 15 reds and 16,500 silvers.

Nome Subdistrict

The fresh water subsistence area set gillnet schedule is from 6 p.m. Monday until 6 p.m. Wednesday and from 6 p.m. Thursday until 6 p.m. Saturday. Check the back of the Nome Subdistrict subsistence salmon permit for the subsistence areas where set gillnetting is allowed and the catch limits by river. Beach seining is not allowed.

In the marine waters subsistence set gillnet fishing is open 7 days a week with no catch limits.

Cumulative counts through August 23 were 6 kings, 5,500 chums, 95,000 pinks, 25 reds and 750 silvers. The silver count is in the bottom third of the 14 years since the project was extended to count the silver run, however, an aerial survey did show good numbers of silvers below the weir. The average historical midpoint is August 28.

Snake River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 1,600 - 2,500 - A cooperative project between Fish & Game and NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 23 were 9 kings, 3,900 chums, 19,500 pinks, 80 reds and 220 silvers. The silver count is in the bottom third of the 13 years of weir counts, however, an aerial survey did show silvers below the weir, but with the nice weather and lower water levels there likely has been little interest by the silvers to move upriver. The average historical midpoint is best in the 12 years of weir opera-

Kotzebue

The 2014 Kotzebue commercial salmon harvest has exceeded 600,000 chum salmon for only the third time in history. The catch is now 606,000 chum salmon and the final catch is projected to rank second greatest, trailing the record catch of 677,000 chum salmon in 1981. Payments to fishermen have been 2.6 million dollars and for the first time since 1988 have exceeded 1 million dollars. The ex-vessel value of the fishery is second greatest trailing the record ex-vessel value in 1981 of 3.2 million dollars.

Annual Garden Tour reveals hidden garden treasures

By Kirsten Bey

It was 71 degrees at 8 p.m. on Sunday, August 24. Where did you spend the day and what did you do? Forty-five Nome residents (almost as many children as adults) spent the afternoon and evening touring 13 different garden sites in Nome and the surrounding area.

The Annual Garden Tour is one of Nome's premier events at summer's end. The weather was perfect for looking at, admiring and learning from the amazing gardens in Nome.

In town the tour started at Abby and Dan Bachelder's outside garden and greenhouse. Who would have guessed that a beautiful lawn lies behind that "picket" fence surrounding the front yard right across Front Street from the ocean?

Kids involved with the Boys & Girls Club have taken over the greenhouse from the Little Sisters under the guidance of Janet Brower. The greenhouse was moved to the Methodist church area just this spring yet it was full of growing things – flowers and vegetables.

Peggy Fagerstrom's flower "garden" melding rocks, beach glass, artifacts and flowers in her unique artistic array always brings smiles, oohs and awes from visitors.

On the way out of town the tour stopped at Kim Knudsen's greenhouse in the Martinsonville subdivision. Kim's garden offers something for everyone, from regular run of the mill peas to ultra hot peppers, Viet-namese eggplant, and a mystery bean. Kim shows that Nome Grown is the best.

In Icyview the tour visited Kay and Jim Hansen's yard and across the street, Angela Hansen's hidden garden. Unless you've been there you would have no idea what garden treasures lie behind that line of willows in the back of their yard: chickens (maybe they were ducks), greenhouses, real garden paths and a trampoline.

Spinning Rock Rd is a gardening hot spot. After the Hansens', the tour stopped at Sue Steinacher's to see a couple greenhouses, lots of outside boxes, also a hidden sitting area. Who knew that willows offer such horticultural options? Across the street were raspberries and other goodies at the Gorn residence. Finally, in Icyview, the tour stopped at Diana Adams' 30 year-old greenhouse – certainly the greenhouse in longest operation on our tour.

The tour next visited the greenhouses at the high school. They are utilized by the Sub Arctic Gardening class offered annually by Northwest Campus and taught by Cheryl Thompson. If you have any interest in gardening and want to get an idea what is involved with gardening in these high latitudes, this class is for you. With very little monetary investment you can learn all you need to know to start your own garden. If you decide gardening is not for you, you haven't invested a lot of money in equipment you'll never use again. If gardening is for you, you've got a very good foundation. But be aware while there is little monetary investment in the class, there is a lot of time and work required.

Lisa Leeper's greenhouse. In only a couple years Lisa has a going (or is that growing) concern.

Over the hill to the east the tour stopped at Sylvia Matson's greenhouse and outside, in the ground garden. The kids on the tour were busy pulling carrots out of the ground, that's right the ground — not raised beds, not beds covered in cloth or glass, but carrots right out of the

Nome-Beltz runners test themselves during southern road trip

By Keith Conger Friday — ACS Invitational at Bartlett High School

The Nome-Beltz cross country running team started its season on the road in Anchorage on Friday and put its pre-season training to the test at an invitational race hosted by Anchorage Christian School.

Wilson Hoogendorn was the Nanooks' top male runner with a time of 18 minutes 39 seconds, which earned him fourth place out of 64 runners. The race was attended by varsity squads from Nome, ACS, Seward and Kotzebue, and by the JV squad from 4-A Wasilla.

According to Nome-Beltz cross country running coach Crystal Tobuk, it is important for runners to build a base before the start of school by putting in lots of miles during the summer months. "If you want to be really fast once the season comes," said Tobuk, "you need to prepare during the off season."

Former coach Jeff Collins, who got to attend the Nanooks' first race of the season, echoed those thoughts. Collins said that sophomore Wilson Hoogendorn really took his training to another level this past June and July.

"Wilson did twice-a-day workouts, and regularly put in 8-milers, and even did a 15 and a 20-miler," said Collins. "He really came into the season prepared."

Leif Erikson supported the team's efforts by cracking the top 10 with a time of 19:28.

The Nanooks traveled with the minimum of five varsity boy runners. Freshman Harrison Moore finished 32nd with at time of 20:45. James Horner finished 36th with at time of 21:09, and freshman John Wade finished 47th in a time of 22:36.

Regional opponent Kotzebue's top finisher was junior Gary Eakin who finished in 14th place with a time of 19:35. Eakin's sibling Zeke was the second Kotzebue boy across the line in a time of 20:10, earning him a 23rd place finish.

The Nanook boys' team ended up being beat by the three southern schools, but were able to outdistance Kotzebue.

In determining team scores in cross-country running, only the top runners on any squad can contribute points. Teams add up the places of their top five finishers to get a team score. The lower the team score the higher the finish.

The Kotzebue team score of 115 at the meet might seem well behind the Nanooks' score of 98, but having lots of racers from other teams can sometimes cloud those results. If the two teams used their Bartlett times in a mock, head-to-head race (without any other runners involved) their team scores would have lead to a victory for Kotzebue with a score of 27 - 28.

As the season progresses, what will really matter for both teams is how they perform against regional competition when it's time to qualify for State in late September.

Tobuk says the real surprise at the start of the 2014 cross country season is Christine Buffas. Tobuk had seen Buffas running this summer and convinced her to come out for the team. The Nome-Beltz junior, who was competing in her very first high school cross country race, took fifth place out of 38 runners in a time of

"Christine is a hard worker. She comes to every practice and is always on time. She pushes herself and asks good questions," said Tobuk. "Christine told me that the longest run she did this summer was a 17-miler. I could see her being a longer distance runner some day'

The Nome-Beltz girls finished fourth out of four teams at the race. Bianca Trowbridge finished in 24th place with a time of 25:43; senior Alexis Hutson finished in 27th place with a time of 26:28; freshman Katie Kelso finish in 30th place with a time of 27:38; and senior Janelle Trowbridge finished in 37th place in a time of 31:47.

The race was hosted by ACS, but

NEW KID ON THE BLOCK ¬— Junior Christine Buffas leads the Nome-Beltz girls team at Skyview High School. Buffas, who was recruited by Nanooks coach Crystal Tobuk, set personal records for each race. This was not a surprise for the first race, since it was her first high school cross-country running competition. Tobuk says that Buffas has been asking all the right questions, and giving a great effort, which allowed her to knock a full minute off her time on day two of a grueling road trip.

Nome women enjoy Volleyball camp in Hawaii

By Kathy Holly and Caitlyn Sherman-Luce

Kathy Holly and Caitlyn Sherman-Luce spent the winter months of 2013 and the spring taking advantage of fund raising opportunities in the community. The goal was to attend a five-day intensive advanced skills volleyball camp. The camp was held at Kamehameha School in Kea'au on the Big Island of Hawaii. The camp was co-ed, which brought a whole new dynamic to the game. Nets were higher and hits were more explosive and much faster and harder with men on the court.

Participating were members of the high school boys' team that took second place in the state of Hawaii. Says Kathy, "I have definitely improved at this camp. My ball handling skills and mental determination have increased exponentially. I am thankful for the support everyone gave us to make this camp happen for us.'

After five 12 hour days of volleyball camp, they experienced as much of the Big Island as possible.

On day one, they were instantly immersed in the local culture when they got lost. They made it to their new Auntie Ana Araki's home on the beach in a secluded remote cove.

Says Caitlyn, "We swam with sea turtles and received a freshly caught aku fish. We ate it for breakfast with fresh fruit. We visited Mauna Kea Observatory and the Volcano National Park. So, thank you Nome, for the support you gave us."

The volleyball camp we attended was not the same as any other camp. We played co-ed ball with a men'sheight net, which was a disadvantage and a strength. The change in height made it harder to hit and block, but it also helped increase our vertical jump and caused them to play smarter ball. These skills were improved in the mornings when we helped coach and instruct younger children. Teaching them to hold their platform after a pass, to keep their arms straight after a pass, or to call the ball. It doesn't just make them better players, it makes the coach a better coach as well. We gave back and contributed by encouraging and helping the younger players. One rule for us as coaches was we were not allowed to yawn in front of the kids or else we'd have to sing in front of everyone at the camp for 20 seconds. After 12 to 14 hours of volleyball a day, there was a lot of singing by coaches and kids.

After camp, we went to as many places as we could and attended events all over the Big Island.

We met lots of local folks, made friends, and learned about their lifestyles. We shared smoked fish, fireweed jelly, pictures and Alaskan experiences with them. The Kamehameha Day Parade in Kona was spectacular. We got to watch traditional hula dancing and watch an invitational hula. We visited ancient sites, swam with sea turtles, studied sea turtles at rest on black sand beaches, shared a day at the beach with an endangered Hawaiian Monk seal (a total beach hog), snorkeled with manta rays, visited one of the last working fishing villages, toured the university campus at Hilo and networked with the volleyball coach, and went to several farmers markets. We hiked around waterfalls and botanical gardens, caught geckos and chased mongooses. It was the best. Mahalo and Quyana for all who gave us their support.

because there is no cross county running trail at their school, the trail at Bartlett High School, site of this year's state cross country championships on October 4, was used.

Tobuk feels that having a race early in the season at Bartlett helps the runners learn what they might encounter if they qualify for the state meet. It provided them with an added incentive to come back explained Tobuk. "If any travel to state they'll already know the course. They'll know how to pace themselves and when to push themselves.'

According to Collins, Buffas' time in the invitational would have placed her in the top 20 at the 1A-2A-3A state meet last year, which was also held at Bartlett.

With the exception of the Wasilla squad, all the schools the Nanooks encountered on Friday were 3-A schools, a designation given to them by ASAA, the Alaska School Activities Association. The 3-A schools have student populations between 150 and 500; 4-A is the highest designation. The largest high school population in the state is the 2,139 students attending East High in Anchorage.

Saturday — Double Challenge in Soldotna

Making the most of travel dollars is a necessity for teams off the road system. With that in mind, the Nome-Beltz Cross Country team headed south from Anchorage to Soldotna last Saturday to race in the Tsaltishi Invitational at Sky view High School. Not only were the Nanooks racing for the second time in two days, but almost the entire competition came from 4-A schools.

The Nanooks boys were again led by Hoogendorn whose personal best time of 17:54 earned him the 48th spot out of 117 varsity runners. Only two runners from 3-A schools finished the race ahead of Hoodendorn.

Buffas continued to impress by taking a full minute off her time from the ACS race. Her time of 21:05 placed her 46th in a field of 108 varsity girl runners. Only two runners from 3-A schools finished the race ahead of Buffas.

The Nanook runners responded positively to back-to-back races and a 6:30 a.m. drive south from Anchorage. Seven of ten runners beat their times from the previous day.

QUINESSENTIAL ALASKAN ACTIVITY — A local Nome musher takes the dogs on a training run overlooking the Bering Sea.

Governor endorses "Right to Mush" in Alaska

By Sarah Miller

Governor Parnell put pen to paper last week, signing the legislative resolution that officially declares Alaska a "right to mush" state. The resolution, championed by Nome's state representative Neal Foster, was introduced in the legislature last March during Iditarod week. "Nome is the finish for the Iditarod dog sled race, and the entire Bering Strait region from Shishmaref to St. Michael has a rich history of dog mushing. So I was happy that our district was able to get the resolution passed with the support of a number of local organizations," wrote Foster in an email response. HCR 24 passed the House and Senate bodies unanimously. While not a legally binding law, it is a symbolic representation of legislators' support of mushing in Alaska. The governor's signature was not necessary for the resolution to become official; however, Parnell opted to endorse HCR 24 nonetheless. In an email, Parnell commented on his approval of the resolution. "Mushing is celebrated as an important part of our culture and history in Alaska. I was pleased to sign the resolution declaring Alaska a right-tomush state- recognizing and honoring the unique role of dog mushing and dog mushers across the Last Frontier."

Nome residents and mushers Nils Hahn and Diana Haecker spearheaded the movement to declare Alaska a right to mush state. When the pair began to experience challenges to their use of trails for dog teams as well as objections to the operation of a kennel on their property, they became aware that such experiences were shared by mushers across the state, in both rural and urban areas. "People have been mushing for hundreds of years, for generations," explained Hahn, who has mushed competitively for 22 years. "In many communities, the people have grown up with it. It was a necessity, part of their survival, part of their culture and their spiritual well being. Mushing is a noble tradition, requiring much work, effort, and a lifelong commitment to the dog team. But we began to realize there are people who are against it, who would try to take it away. We heard stories of mushers living in populated areas that have experienced harassment. A lot of dog mushers would say we don't need the resolution, that we already have the right to mush, especially if you live in a rural setting," stated Hahn. "I thought so, too. But I found that it can happen to anyone, anywhere."

Realizing that such conflicts would continue as long as formerly isolated areas of the state become more developed and urbanized, Hahn and Haecker drafted the Right To Mush resolution, modeling it after "right to farm" laws in other states. Such laws protect farmers from lawsuits from those who perceive agricultural practices and animal husbandry as nuisances. Alaska's statewide mushing community quickly gathered behind the resolution as a means to raise awareness of the need for protection of the sport. Kennel clubs, well-known Iditarod champions, and Native tribal organizations drafted their own resolutions as a demonstration of their support for the statewide declaration.

Supporters of the resolution are hopeful that it will increase the public's understanding that mushing is less a hobby than a way of life, a definitive part of Alaskan culture and identity that needs protection in the same way that subsistence practices require. Mike Williams, Sr. of Akiak, who has run the Iditarod 15 times, was instrumental in obtaining support for the resolution from the Alaska Federation of Natives. need to see mushing alive in perpetuity in Alaska, despite all the challenges that come with growth and more people coming into the state from the outside. In Bethel and the surrounding communities, it's pretty much a mushing community, but we still see the challenges to it that come with changes and development. There's more of that in Anchorage and in the valley, with urban sprawl. But mushing needs to be protected for good."

While many Alaskans appreciate the tradition of mushing in major events such as the Iditarod and other large races, as well as the positive publicity and tourism dollars the state sport generates, the attitude of "not in my neighborhood" persists, commented Hahn.

"This is going to be an ongoing effort for people who live in developing areas."

The high cost of living in rural Alaska prevents many from keeping competitive dog teams and, across the state, many mushers can only afford to keep their teams if they are able to house them on their own land.

Furthermore, the demanding and constant level of care and training required by these elite canine athletes necessitates that mushers keep the dog teams in close proximity. Still other mushers continue to rely on their dog teams for subsistence living in Alaska, a lifestyle, which also requires the teams be kept on one's own property. Moreover, most mushers would not have it any other way. The deep affection, respect, and commitment mushers feel toward their dogs is a tremendously compelling motivation to protect the right to mush. "This resolution can be a positive way to advocate for treating animals in a responsible manner, which is what successful mushers do," said Hahn.

Mushers agree there is still more work to be done to protect the sport in Alaska. "We need to continue promoting dog mushing, to get more people on board, and work to develop trail designations, access, and maintenance arrangements," said Hahn. "There may also need to be a law to protect mushers in a legal way."

the Russian hydrographic research ship Marshal Gelovani, raised the flag in recognition of the Russian Navy's decision to build a naval base on the island.

The island is named after Russian Lieutenant Ferdinand Petrovich Wrangel who explored the Russian north from 1820-1824. His assignment included exploring the northern extent of Russia's land in Siberia. Wrangel traveled by sled from Indi-girka River to the Kolyuchinskaya Bay in the Chukchi Sea. The historian Jeannette Mirsky called Wrangel's expedition "the greatest sledging trip of that generation." He passed south of the island later named after him, an island that Siberian natives had told him about, but which he did not see.

Britain claimed the island, partly based on Captain Henry Kellett of HMS Herald seeing the island in 1849.

The United States claimed the island, partly based on having made the first landing in 1881 and partly because the U.S. Geological Survey had briefly listed it and other frozen islands in the District of Alaska.

Canada never recognized Stefansson's claim to the island, which Stefannson and other survivors of his Karluk expedition reached in 1914. Furthermore, Stefansson's Wrangel Island Expedition of 1921 had its problems.

The Russian claim was based partly on proximity to the Russian mainland, partly on Lt. Wrangell's documenting accounts of the island and his search for it in the early 1820s, partly on the Russian icebreakers Taymir and Vaigatch visiting Wrangel in 1911 and the crew building a navigational beacon on the island, and partly on exercising its claim in 1924.

In 1924, Russia removed an American trader named Charles Wells and 13 Alaska natives (Eskimos) from the island. Wells died in a Soviet prison. The Russians deported the Alaska Natives to China, The American Red Cross brought the ten survivors back to Alaska.

The date of the new flag-raising is symbolic because 90 years ago, on August 20, 1924, a Russian hydrographic officer named Boris Davydov raised a flag on the island. At that time the Soviet Union was already using the Red Flag (with the yellow hammer, sickle, and star).

The flag of the Marshal Gelovani is St. Andrew's Cross, a blue saltire (X) on a white background. The Russian imperial Navy used that ensign from 1712 to 1918. After the collapse of the Soviet Union, the Navy of the new Russian Federation again adopted St. Andrew's Cross as its ensign.

St. Andrew was a fisherman, like his brother St. Peter. The Romans tied St. Andrew to a saltire cross, and on that cross he died. Both Russia and Scotland have adopted St. Andrew as their national patron. St. Andrew's Cross is the flag of Scotland and the ensign of the Russian Navy

A Russian press release from the Eastern Military District did not indicate the location of the forthcoming naval base: that location is of interest to Mark J. Seidenberg. He asserts a claim as "the successor to the award of the late Ralph Lomen for the damage caused by troops of the Soviet Union, circa August 20, 1924 on Wrangell," as he explained in recent correspondence.

In 1990 the United States and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Russia) signed a maritime boundary treaty that defined an international border with Wrangel and four other frozen islands (Herald, Jeannette, Henrietta, Bennett in the English names) on the Russian side of the maritime boundary. That treaty is based the boundary on the border defined in the United States-Russia Convention of 1867, when the United States purchased Alaska from Russia.

In 1999 Seidenberg with other officers of the small State Department Watch group wrote protesting the maritime boundary between Alaska and Siberia. They argue that the United States and Russia are wrong about Wrangel Island.

He even insists the spelling is Wrangell Island, not Wrangel. Historically one "l" and two were both used in the name. Furthermore, there is a Wrangell Island near Wrangell, Alaska. Wrangel with one "l" is the

Failure to comply with the following stipulations is a violation and may result in revocation of your DNR mining permit.

This is a reminder to all offshore mining operators using suction dredge and mechanical placer mining equipment that the uplands in the Nome area are privately owned.

Stipulations regarding surface use and camping are in the Terms of Permit Sections 4 & 5 of your DNR mining permit and in the Permit Stipulations for the Nome East and West Beach Mining Areas.

- Miners may not park or leave equipment on the beach or uplands without the land owner's permission.
- Miners may not camp or mine the beach or uplands without the land owner's permission.

Chukotkans visited St. Lawrence Island for first time in 15 years

By Diana Haecker

For the first time in 15 years, a delegation of Chukotkan visitors boated across the Bering Strait from Provideniya to St. Lawrence Island to visit with their relatives.

John Waghiyi of Savoonga said those visits have happened since time immemorial but had become impossible during the Cold War when the Iron Curtain fell between the USA and the USSR. When the Soviet government collapsed, the first contact between Chukotkans and Alaskans came about with the 1988 Friendship Flight from Nome to Provideniya.

For a decade or so, boat travels between SLI and Chukotka resumed but government restrictions increased after the last visit in August 1999 ended tragically. A boat was lost at sea and a father and son died on their way home from St. Lawrence Island to Chukotka.

Now it was time to revive the tradition.

"We started lobbying for them to come back, starting in May and it finally happened," said Waghiyi.

On July 22, 12 men in two boats with outboard engines came from Provideniya and landed at St. Lawrence Island.

It took them four and a half hours to motor to Gambell.

After spending a couple days in Gambell, visiting relatives and enjoying Eskimo dancing, the Chukotkan visitors boated to Savoonga, where they stayed for three weeks until August 14.

According to Waghiyi, two of the men were still able to speak Siberian-Yupik, the common language of Chukotkans and St. Lawrence Island residents. "Our ancestral ties go back to Chukotka," explained Waghiyi about the importance of the men's visit

Just like St. Lawrence Island, the men are hunters for their communities, Waghiyi said.

"They are hired by the state to hunt for their people."

While on St. Lawrence Island, the visitors received generous gift donations that they took home.

"They returned loaded with gifts," Waghiyi said.

Waghiyi commented that the men were excellent mechanics. They spent their time fixing outboard motors and restoring boats, and in return the 12 visitors were gifted with three boats and outboard motors, gas, a spool of rope and the North Slope Borough Mayor Charlotte Brower made a $10,000 donation.

Arctic Waterway Safety Committee to be formed

By Diana Haecker

Driven by the desire to minimize risks linked to the increase of maritime traffic through the Bering Strait, marine mammal co-management groups, regional government bodies and the U.S. Coast Guard will meet on Thursday, August 28, to organize an Arctic Waterway Safety Committee.

District 17 of the USCG is hosting the event in Anchorage.

A growing concern in the Bering Strait region is that increased maritime traffic would jeopardize subsistence and food security. This common denominator has resulted in the creation of the Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition, which consists of five Native co-management entities Alaska Nanuuq Commission, the Eskimo Walrus Commission, Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission, Alaska Beluga Whale Committee and the Ice Seal Committee.

The Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition, AMMC for short, represents marine mammal hunters interests. The AMMC met in Washington, D.C. in February and produced a report and set goals for the near future. "The principal goal of the AMMC is to work closely with scientists, regulators and industry representatives to design voluntary measures that minimize the impacts of Arctic shipping on marine mammals, subsistence hunters and their communities," the report reads.

During a meeting in June 2013, Coast Guard representatives asked AMMC to consider the formation of a Waterway Safety Committee. "By taking the leadership role in the formation of such a committee, the AMMC and its affiliated organizations can help to ensure that the voices of their hunters and community members are prominently present in the Committee's deliberations," says the report.

On the agenda for Thursday are presentations by U.S. Coast Guard Commander James Houck and AMMC chairman Willie Goodwin of Kotzebue about subsistence and food security concerns. Scheduled are discussions about subsistence resources and harvest locations by North Slope Borough personnel and Julie Raymond-Yakoubian with Kawerak Inc. NOAA will address federal laws governing the impacts to the availability of marine mammals.

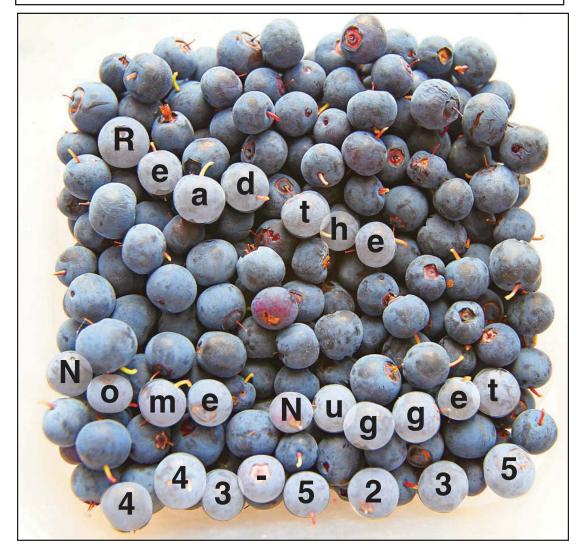

North Slope Borough Mayor Charlotte Brower, City of Nome Mayor Denise Michels and North West Arctic Borough Mayor Reggie Joule are slated to talk about proposed port authorities. As the North Slope Borough has had more experience with resource development in their backyard, Harry Brower, the chairman of the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission will speak about the conflict avoidance agreement the whaling captains have with resource developers. Retired USCG Captain Ed Page with the Marine Exchange of Alaska will guide a discussion about the definition, the authority and the benefits of a Waterway Safety Committee.

The group is also going to discuss membership on the AWSC and how the committee will interact with regulators and state and federal governments

US Coast Guard hosts organizational meeting to form Arctic Waterway Safety Committee

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Coast Guard convened a meeting in Anchorage to kick off an effort to form an Arctic Waterway Safety Committee.

It ended with a commitment to form a steering committee consisting of nine people: three representing subsistence interests; three representing industry and three representtribes, borough or city governments. Nome Mayor Denise Michels said the steering committee, once identified, would formulate creation documents, come up with a funding mechanism and define the purpose and goals of the committee.

The idea to form an Arctic Waterway Safety Committee, AWSC for short, is rooted in the anticipated increase of marine traffic through the Bering Strait and the inherent risks to subsistence resources such as marine mammals that are harvested to sustain residents of the Arctic.

The Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition, AMMC for shorts, formed by the five Native co-management groups (Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission, Eskimo Walrus Commission, The Alaska Nanuuq Commission, Alaska Beluga Whale Committee and the Ice Seal Committee), spearheaded the effort to form a Waterway Safety or Harbor Safety Committee. The committee is envisioned to serve as a forum for all who share the emerging Arctic waterway and to figure out how to be safe on the water.

The US Coast Guard District 17 hosted last week's, first organizational meeting. It brought together representatives from the Coast

Guard, Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission, Alaska Beluga Whale Committee, Eskimo Walrus Commission, Ice Seal Committee, The Alaska Nanuuq Commission, resource development industry, shippers, AMMC, North Slope Borough, Northwest Arctic Borough, City of Nome, Kawerak, Marine Exchange

Mallot and Walker form Unity Ticket

By Diana Haecker

In an emergency meeting on Monday night, the State Central Committee of the Alaskan Democratic Party voted 89 to 2 to allow for a Unity Ticket between Independent candidate Bill Walker and Democratic candidate Byron Mallot.

The Unity Ticket will feature Bill Walker as the gubernatorial candidate and Byron Mallot as the Lt. Governor.

Mallot won the Democratic primary election on August 19. Bill Walker, an attorney from Anchorage, did not appear on the ballot since he was running as an independent candidate.

According to Alaska Democratic Party spokesman Zack Fields, Mallot and Walker had been in talks for a week about merging their campaigns in order to have a realistic chance to defeat incumbent Governor Sean Parnell. Polls suggested that in a three-way race neither Mallot nor Walker could have won. In an unprecedented move, they teamed up on a Unity Ticket. Polls after the decision was made public showed a tie in the gubernatorial race between Walker/Mallott and Parnell.

With Mallot's withdrawal, this gubernatorial election marks the first one without a Democratic candidate in the race in Alaska. It is also unprecedented that a Democrat teams up with an Independent on a unified Hollis French, who was the Democratic candidate for Lieutenant Governor also withdrew to allow Mallot to run as Lt. Gov. on the Unified ticket. Craig Fleener, running alongside Bill Walker as Lt. Governor, also withdrew to make room for Byron Mallot.

In response to the news, Forrest Dunbar, Democratic nominee for U.S. House, said he was excited to see a Unity Ticket in the gubernatorial race.

"This decision by Byron and Bill to set aside their differences and work together on behalf of Alaska is exactly what our state needs, and is also the kind of thing that will inspire Millennials to become more involved in electoral politics.'

Musk ox pushing biologists for creative solutions

Two studies of collared musk ox calving periods and musk ox calf mortality on the Seward Peninsula this summer show a decline in the overall muskox population even though the numbers of animals hanging out in Nome have in-declining rapidly," said Tony Gorn, area biologist for Game Management Unit 22. "There are a lot of red flags in the population.'

Gorn was speaking at an Aug. 26 meeting of Nome residents who have had dogs attacked by musk ox or who are concerned about the increasing presence of 100-150 musk ox in town. Assistant Deputy Director of Alaska Department of Fish and Game Bruce Dale attended. Letty Hughes, ADF&G biologist also attended to answer questions.

The ADF&G surveys the peak calving in mid-May and again in late June to early July.

Both showed high rates of predation by brown bears.

Gorn compared numbers from calf surveys conducted in 2014 and 2008. In May this year, staff found 38 calves per 100 adults, in areas generally bear-free: Port Clarence and near the headwaters of the Nome, Flambeau and Snake rivers and the Fish River flats.

In the groups of musk ox around Nome, the number decreased to a very low count of calves in the population of 13 calves per 100 adults.

Early to mid-May the department started to get reports about brown bears in the area. On May 19, they found a dead calf on Anvil Mountain. They observed a group in the Hastings area with no calves that had four calves a few days before.

This all coincides with brown bears coming in during peak musk ox calving time.

On May 20, ADF&G started what Gorn calls the "3 a.m. Musk ox Moving Group, basically up in the middle of the night during that period and through the whole month of June moving herds.'

In late May, brown bear harvests started coming in with stomach contents showing musk ox hair indicat-

Dear Editor:

The greatest weapon in the arsenal of stupidity

In my opinion, the greatest weapon in the arsenal of stupidity is the childish infighting that is constantly being engaged in by our own elected government! "Can these people agree on nothing at all, even that which is logical and obvious?"

To Hell with global warming, if these political alley cats were immersed up to their vested little necks in seawater, they would still be debating whether or not to prescribe swimming lessons to those who were drowning in the tempest that these politicians often generate on their own!

Many of the problems that confront us today are not that complex, and could even be categorized as nobrainers that a first year political science student could probably overcome by himself? Unfortunately, however, if the other political party thought of a workable solution first, or if some overly arrogant bureaucrat could not usurp (steal) the credit for the brainchild of another, the suggestion is summarily dismissed, ridiculed, and even demonized! "And upon this self-poisoned blade, many an egoist and politician alike has impaled millions!"

"A little less vacationing, electioneering, fundraising, me-ism, and buck-passing in government - coupled with a little more affirmative action and bipartisan consideration on the part of most politicians — could indeed work wonders!"

Oh, Spare Us!

Full-blown ballyhoo— the political races are revving up and the TV ads are packing in the mud to start slinging. What ever happened to the informative ad that said what the candidate stood for, what they planned to do and why we should vote for them? Now all we get is negative hissy fits that would put a bunch of junior high girls to shame. Tell Senator Begich to ___blah, blah, blah! Don't you just want to say, "Shut up and tell him yourself"? They shout liar, liar, pants on fire and expect us to take them seriously while they wrap themselves in the flag.

Then there are the political opinion surveys and polls where they always call at suppertime. Try to not get too analytical. It's easy to see how they can skew results. They try to steer answers in the direction that would favor their candidate. Don't try to confront the questioner with real facts. If you are lucky your pollster speaks English or some recognizable form of it.

Check to see if the folks who pay for the ads or do the surveys have names. Listen real hard and try to make out who they are. Try to read the name written in white letters on a light gray background. Ask the survey taker to slowly repeat who is paying for the survey. If you never heard of them, hang up.

BUSINESS REPRESENTATIVE - Gail Schubert, pictured here addressing the Arctic Policy Commission in Nome last week, was appointed to represent Alaska and the USA at the Arctic Economic Council.

Arctic Economic Council holds founding meeting

The Arctic Economic Council is being formed this week in Iqaluit, Canada. The council is a new body created by the Arctic Council under the chairmanship of Canada. Canadian Arctic Council chair Leona Aglukkaq said last July that the Arctic Economic Council's task is to facilitate business opportunities, trade, investment and growth in the best interests of northerners.

The founding meeting is set to take place this week Sept. 2-3 in Iqaluit. It will bring together representatives from the Arctic Council's eight members states and six indigenous permanent participant organi-

Bering Strait Native Corporation's CEO and President Gail Schubert and two other Alaskans were appointed to represent Alaska and the United States

The other two Alaskans are Lori Davey, General Manager, Fairweather, LLC and Bruce Harland, Vice President Business Development, Crowley Marine Services, Inc. The Inuit Circumpolar Council will be represented by Tara Sweeney, executive vice president of the Arctic Slope Regional Corp. Ed Schultz, a former grand chief of the Council of Yukon First Nations, and Richard Nerysoo, a former Northwest Territories government leader, will represent the Arctic Athabaskan Council, which speaks for Dene and Athabaskan language groups living in the NWT, Yukon and Alaska. Ron Daub of Old Crow, Yukon represented Gwich'in International. Aleut International Association sent Janet Reiser, director of business and resource development with the Aleut Corp. of Alaska. The Russian Association of Indigenous Peoples of the North, or RAIPON, sent vice president Lyubov Peshperova and Alexey Panov, an entrepreneur. Anders Oskal of Norway, the executive director of the International Centre for Reindeer Husbandry, and Anders Blom of Sweden, the managing director of a company called Njalla AB, represent the Saami Council.

The eight members states have named their representatives, many of them executives with companies involved in shipping, tourism, mining, communications and oil and gas development. That includes Ingmar Haga, the managing director of Agnico-Eagle Finland Ltd., and Andrey Shiskin, vice president of Russia's Rosneft Oil Co., and Tom Paddon, the chief executive officer of Baffinland Iron Mines.

The goal of the meeting is to create an independent circumpolar body that will maintain a close relationship with the Arctic Council.

IPCC sends grim climate report to governments

The authors of the Intergovernmental Report on Climate Change, IPCC for short, have finished drafting a synthesis report and sent the draft to governments for comments on the text. "This Synthesis Report, integrating the findings of the three working group contributions to the IPCC's Fifth Assessment Report and two special reports, will provide policymakers with a scientific foundation to tackle the challenge of climate change. It would help governments and other stakeholders work together at various levels, including a new international agreement to limit climate change," said IPCC Chairman Rajendra Pachauri.

The report has not been released to the public, but a copy was leaked to the New York Times.

A request by the Nome Nugget to obtain an executive summary of the was denied.

According to the NYT, the report uses "blunter and more forceful" language and highlights the urgency to deal with risks associated with continued emissions of heat-trapping gases into the atmosphere. The report says that if society wants to limit the risks to future generations, it must find the discipline to leave a vast maiority of fossil fuels like coal, oil and natural gas in the ground.

The comments received from governments will prepare the way for the meeting in Copenhagen on October 27 to 31 at which the IPCC will finalize the synthesis report. The report will be released to the public at a press conference on 2 November. The Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change has been established by World Meteorological Organization and United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) to assess scientific, technical and socio-economic information relevant for the understanding of climate change, its potential impacts and options for adaptation and mitigation.

Coast Guard tests unmanned aircraft

Coast Guard and National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration researchers successfully landed an unmanned aircraft system on the flight deck of Coast Guard Cutter Healy last week, marking the first time a UAS has completed a take-off and landing aboard a Coast Guard icebreaker.

UAS operators from AeroVironment, working alongside researchers from the Coast Guard Research and Development Center and NOAA made necessary adjustments following several unsuccessful attempts to land the Puma AE on the icebreaker's flight deck. High winds, heavy fog, and icing conditions delaved further attempts until Monday night when skies cleared enough for another attempt. UAS operators came close to landing the system on the initial attempt before managing three successful landings. The last was a perfect landing onto the center of the flight deck.

Researchers and crew aboard the Healy left Seward, Aug. 8 to conduct testing of the Puma AE and other technologies for use as oil spill tracking tools. The UAS is equipped with an electro-optical and infrared camera plus illuminator on a lightweight mechanical gimbaled payload allowing its operator to keep constant watch over the device's target.

The Coast Guard RDC and NOAA hope to utilize UAS and other unmanned technologies to perform monitoring and search operations in the Arctic and other areas where hazardous conditions might otherwise place human observers in increased danger.

"The Coast Guard and its partners realize the value of exploring technologies like UAS to improve our ability to respond in the Arctic," said Rich Hansen, RDC Chief Scientist traveling aboard Healy. "Unmanned systems have great potential for tracking spills, so responders can avoid unnecessary risk while safeguarding our seas.'

The Coast Guard Research and Development Center is based in New London, Conn., and aids the Coast Guard by providing research and evaluations of technologies and equipment with the potential for enhancing its ability to carry out its missions.

Coast Guard Cutter Healy is a 420-foot icebreaker home-ported in Seattle, Wash. The icebreaker's crew conducts the Coast Guard's traditional missions including search and rescue, environmental protection and enforcement of laws and treaties while performing their primary mission of assisting with scientific research in polar regions.

New study offers clues to swift Arctic extinction

The Arctic has a relatively well-researched archaeology, but an understanding of its genetic history was lacking until now.

Last week, the Journal Science presented studies of agenome-wide sequences from ancient and presentday humans from Greenland, Arctic Canada, Alaska, Aleutian Islands and Siberia.

Analyses of these genomes indicate that the Arctic was colonized 6,000 years ago by a migration separate from the one that gave rise to other Native American populations.

But these original paleo-inhabitants of the Arctic appear to have completely vanished 700 years ago.

Paleo-Eskimos (3,000 BC to 1,300 CE) represent a migration pulse into the Americas independent of both Native American and Inuit expansions, researchers concluded.

The genetic continuity characterizing the Paleo-Eskimo period was interrupted by the arrival of a new population, representing the ancestors of present-day Inuit, with evidence of past gene flow between these lineages. Despite periodic abandonment of major Arctic regions, a single Paleo-Eskimo population likely survived in near-isolation for more than 4,000 years, only to vanish around 700 years ago.

DNA data show that the Paleo-Eskimos are closer to each other than to any other present-day population. The Thule culture represents a distinct people that are genetic and cultural ancestors of modern-day Inuit. Researchers found that the Siberian Birnirk culture (6th to 7th century CE) are likely cultural and genetic ancestors of the Thule. The extinct Sadlermiut people from the Hudson Bay region (15th to 19th century CE), considered to be Dorset remnants, are genetically closely related to Thule/Inuit, rather than the Paleo-Eskimos. Moreover, there is no evidence of matrilineal gene flow between Dorset or Thule groups with neighboring Norse (Vikings) populations settling in the Arctic around 1,000 years ago. The researchers detected gene flow between the Paleo-Eskimo and Neo-Eskimo lineages, dating back to at least 4,000 years.

Researchers concluded that the Paleo-Eskimos likely represent a single migration pulse into the Americas from Siberia, separate from the ones giving rise to the Inuit and other Native Americans, including Athabascan speakers. Paleo-Eskimos, despite showing cultural differences across time and space, constituted a single population displaying genetic continuity for more than 4,000 years. The Thule people, ancestors of contemporary Inuit, represent a population replacement of the Paleo-Eskimos that occurred less than 700 years ago.

Over successive millennia, the pioneering Arctic cultures developed into distinct lifestyles and cultural stages grouped within two broad cultural traditions known as Paleo-Eskimo and Neo-Eskimo.

Early Paleo-Eskimo people representing the Denbigh, Pre-Dorset, Independence I, and Saqqaq cultures  $(\sim 3000 \text{ to } 800 \text{ BCE})$  lived in tent camps and hunted caribou, musk ox, and seals with exquisitely flaked stone tools similar to those used by northeast Siberian Neolithic cultures.

In northern Alaska, the Denbigh cultural groups were succeeded by the Paleo-Eskimo Choris and Norton cultures starting around 900 BCE, with the Norton material culture further developing into the Ipiutak culture around 200 CE. Simultaneously, during the cold period beginning around 800 BCE, innovations in housing and hunting technologies accompanied the formation of the Late Paleo-Eskimo or Dorset culture in eastern Arctic (eastern Canadian Arctic and Greenland), with population growth and more intensive use of marine mammals, including wal-

The Paleo-Eskimo tradition in the eastern Arctic ended sometime between 1,150 to 1,350 CE, shortly after the sudden appearance of the Neo-Eskimo Thule whale-hunters from the Bering Strait region.

The last of the Paleo-Eskimos, the Dorset had dominated eastern Canada and Greenland for centuries, hunting seal and walrus through holes in the ice and practicing shamanistic rituals with ornate carvings and masks.

ing bears coming into the area and harassing musk ox groups.

Around May 20 groups of musk ox started moving toward Icy View along with the reports of brown bear sightings, Gorn said.

Game biologists have tried just about everything to dissuade musk ox from hanging out in town.

'We are very good at moving them. We are not very good at getting them to stay," Dale said.

They tried rubber bullets with no long-term effect.

They have tried removing habitat. 'Six years ago we knocked down the bushes at City Field," Gorn said, That didn't work, they kept coming right back, but it at least increased visibility for pilots taking aircraft in and out.

Using helicopters to herd musk ox away was largely ineffective, Gorn said. Groups of the animals would get hung up in rivers and creeks, or willows, and refuse to move.

They are going to try using helicopters, augmented by people on the ground for better coverage, Gorn

They have tried using Tasers on them with electric shocks—effective on bear and moose, but no effect on musk ox, according to Gorn.

The great bear urine project of 2014 was an utter failure, according to Gorn. "I spent a lot of time crawling around on my hands and knees spraying bear pee in their faces and in front of where they were grazing," Gorn said. "I would say at this point they really don't care about bear

Brown bear decoys—a state Dept. of Transportation project at runways - was a failure, but provided some entertainment for people.

Gorn is ready to try electric fences and propane noisemakers, but makes no promises.

"A big part of this is the community learning how they are going to live with musk ox," Gorn said.

People who have had their dogs killed or injured weren't feeling it.

You have options up on the board, but they are not in place, so next summer, June 1, instead of 15 muskox outside of my house, there will be 75 or 80? I have a beautiful cabin on Glacier Creek Road. We have slept there two nights this summer," Laura Samuelson said. "We are screwing with musk ox constantly. Ten nights ago, we saw a rogue musk ox in our yard eating fireweed at 1:30 in the morning.

You guys talk about bears and bulls, but we have to find a solution sooner than later. I had a dog murdered by a musk ox. As soon as you are affected by what happens when these animals come close, the letters of support for musk ox will be torn up," Samuelson said. "It's not a good thing to live in this town, like this. It's not fair."

Diana Adams could not stop crying that one Saturday in July.

A musk ox had gored Onslow, 12, and left him dying near the Nome Kennel Club dog lot. When she came to the lot early Saturday afternoon, Onslow was missing from his usual station. Onslow belongs to Adams' friends, Mitch and Vickie Erickson. Adams and the Ericksons watch out for each other's sled dog teams. They love all the dogs.

That means pinch-hitting at feeding time if someone is away and keeping the dogs from harm.

When I saw the big patch of blood on the ground, I started looking for him and found him like this," Adams sobbed.

MANGLED - Diana Adams surveys a chain-link dog enclosure destroyed by a muskox bent on killing 12-yearold Onslow, a sled dog owned by Vicky and Mitch Erickson, on July 26, 2014. ADF&G staff advise anchoring the fence to the ground and using very strong posts buried deeply.

Adams already lost a dog to musk ox a couple of years ago. Adams held out her left arm.

There was blood on it.

"John [friend John Handeland] had to help me get my arm out of his mouth. I couldn't get my arm out, he was holding on so tight," Adams explained through tears.

Her swollen face said she had been crying since she found "Onsi" at the edge of the pond.

She found "Onsi" in the grass and kneeled down by him when she saw that he was mortally wounded. In his final agony he grabbed hold of her

"I think he was trying to pull himself up out of the pond," Adams said. "I had called Derrick Leedy. He was standing by the phone, but I saw it

Chrystie Salesky, another member of Nome Kennel Club, walked up to Adams and gave her a hug.

Salesky had a gun in her pickup. She bought it to protect herself and the dogs at the lot. She wasn't able to protect Onsi with the firearm.

She wasn't at the dog lot when the musk ox twisted the chain-link dog pen like a pretzel and went after his pain.

When I saw him, I ran to my truck and grabbed my gun because he was suffering so," Salesky said. "I shot him twice.

Adams took back the story. "We debated who would give him the last shot," she said.

Mitch Erickson paced around some yards away and talked to supporters standing around him. He was getting ready to go for a shovel to bury his dog.

Musher and NKC member Janet Balice arrived at the dog lot. She and Adams embraced. They cried.

Earlier this summer, Adams shot dead a musk ox she felt was going to injure her dogs, and was cited by a game regulation enforcement officer. The measure was later converted to a warning.

The ADF&G has never had to sort out musk ox wanting to live in town before.

In addition to the current situation, the department faces other impediments to finding the magic wand. They are bound by laws and regulations. Some have to be set by the state Board of Game. There are always funding issues, Gorn said.

There is not consensus even among dog owners about whether the musk ox should stay, exit stage left where they will not be available for wild life observation or enter the stewpots.

For example, ADF&G cannot number an exact population of brown bear.

"The department staff is pretty good at moose, caribou. Ungulates allow themselves to be surveyed. Brown bears are complicated. Brown bears are tricky," Gorn said. "It has to do with the math of estimation. Working with the National Park Service, we have tried three times over the past 15 years in Unit 22. We're not quite there yet. Every time we go out, we learn a little more, but we're not quite able to estimate the number of brown bears in Game Unit 22." Surveys take several years and a lot of money, biologists say.

"We're assuming it is brown bears with the musk ox population, but it's an assumption. Wolves are increasing dramatically," according to Tim Smith, biologist attending the meeting Aug. 26. Local weather does not allow study teams to fly often enough to enable predation studies, Smith said. In a study of reindeer fawn mortality he saw bears on carcasses, but because of less than desirable flight frequency he could not tell whether the bears had killed the fawn or just happened across a carcass.

The ADF&G has tried programs to reduce brown bear numbers elsewhere in the state with mixed results. One performed by the public had not been effective, Dale said, while another program of removal in the McGrath area had worked. Another program monitored bears on the North Slope. If they caught them in the act of predation they removed them.

Residents are reporting sightings of bear sows with multiple cubs, and think bear numbers are on the rise. Not necessarily, say biologists. Is a sow with four cubs a healthy productive individual, an isolated case, or are there many health individuals with multiple young, biologists wonder.

Earl Merchant would like to see a musk ox removal program—"open the season on them a little earlier or go out at 3 a.m. and harvest a couple and donate the meat."

ADF&G stance is that if they were able to identify repeater aggressive musk ox, they could remove those animals.

The current regulatory language allows the musk ox season to open only on Aug. 1. A change in dates would have to go before the state Board of Game as a proposal undergoing a vote. A proposal would have to be in by May 15 of 2015 for the January 2016 game meeting, and if passed, would go into effect July 1, 2016.

The musk ox bull to cow ratio on the Seward Peninsula has plummeted, according to biologists. According to Gorn, 50 to 60 bulls are needed per 100 cows. The issue is not merely getting the cows bred, but maintaining the social dynamic among musk ox herds. Bulls stabilize the herds.

The public has to assume ownership of the problem, Dale said.

"We just can't turn on a disco ball and all these animals are going to leave. We have to work harder to understand why they are here," Dale said. "They have been around for 40 years and we've not had this issue. When the population was densest, there was no issue. Now that they are declining, we have musk ox very close to town."

Laura Samuelson spoke up.

"I wish we had a solution. How about next spring when we start having this trouble again, we go up in helicopters, see aggressive bears and shoot them?"

If we have consensus there is a problem with bear predation affecting the young of moose and musk ox young, how about putting reindeer numbers into the equation? Dale asked, noting that four years ago there were 450 reindeer in the area, down from 8,000 to 10,000 in the 1990s.

Now that the reindeer numbers are down, my view is the brown bears are going to shift onto the moose and musk ox population," he said.

He had seen plenty of bears on reindeer while flying, Gorn said, acknowledging predation that would reduce reindeer numbers, but he was not going to guess based on the observation that the bears had shifted to musk ox and moose—from which one could conclude that such a shift in predation could be bringing the musk ox to seek safety in Nome's front yards, back yards, bike paths, and dog lots

One resident attending the meeting suggested that ADF&G set a target number of bears for harvest. Hunters could harvest a number and then the department could step in and finish.

Such intensive management is triggered by numbers of animals.

Right now, the area is not eligible. Biologists could identify bears that were harassing musk ox and making them move into town and eliminate those bears. Gorn said.

However, he would rather have permit holders and not department staff kill repeat offender brown bears.

Liberalizing the brown bear hunt is not necessarily an answer, according to the biologists. There is not a lot of interest in bear hunting, according to Gorn.

"Rarely does liberalizing the hunts increase the bear harvests," Dale agreed.

The department is also looking at adjusting hunting areas so that Nome residents could harvest local bears.

"I don't think it is the animals' fault," said John Handeland, who had a dog injured on the horn of a musk ox. "Don't get rid of all the musk ox; let's just not have them so close to where we live."

"Once they have decided a place is their home, it takes a long time to make them want to leave," Claudia Ihl, biologist, commented.

BUSY— Experts predict that maritime traffic through the Bering Strait will increase manyfold as the summer ice sheet in the Arctic continues to decrease, opening up shipping lanes and resources. This will mean busier times for the Port of Nome.

of Alaska, and others.

One of the AWSC's purposes would be to develop voluntary measures for mariners that would minimize disturbance or dangers to Native hunters and the hunted wildlife.

AMMC chair Willie Goodwin of Kotzebue kicked off the meeting by explaining the core of people's concerns and hence the need for a committee to protect a subsistence culture that is still alive and thriving.

He patiently explained that people still don't realize that Alaskans live in the Arctic. "Our people have been here for thousands of years and we still engage in the practices that have sustained us for all this time," Goodwin said. "One of the most important practices, and the one that we're here to talk about today, is marine mammal subsistence hunting. Subsistence means we hunt or gather food and share it with our families and neighbors. Nobody pays us."

Goodwin then spoke about the necessity of the AWSC as a platform to bring stakeholders together and come to agreements. "The most important thing this Committee can do is give our hunters, local representatives and existing stakeholders a platform for working with representatives of the vessel operators that are coming into our waters," he said.

He listed as new users cruise liners, researchers, insurance companies and commercial carriers that operate container ships and tankers. "We all need to be able to work together to figure out how we can use the waterways up in the Arctic in a safe and environmentally sound way," Goodwin said. "Then we can let our regulators know what our needs are. We have our work cut out for us. But up in the Arctic, we're problem-solvers, so I'm confident we're going to be able to put this thing together and make it successful."

Concerns

North Slope Borough Dept. of Wildlife management director Taqulik Hepa said there are well-known concerns about increased shipping and the impacts on walrus using ice floes. A less well-known concern is that researchers who study walrus inadvertently interfere with a safe walrus hunt. Hepa said beluga are a very vocal whale species and that there are concerns that shipping noise interferes with beluga communication. She pointed to evidence of increased ship strikes on landed whales; entanglements, noise pollution and an increase in stress to the animals due to increased human activity.

Julie Raymond-Yakoubian with Kawerak voiced similar concerns from the Bering Strait region: disturbance, noise, large vessels in the hunting areas and the lack of communication between Alaska and Russia.

She added that residents are increasingly worried about contaminations of air and water, ship groundings and discharges from vessels

"Our interest is in food security," said Northwest Arctic Borough Mayor Reggie Joule. "When compared to global economics, that interest is miniscule. The question is how to maintain the balance between non-renewable and renewable industries. What's in it for us?"

To counter the feeling that the sky is falling due to mounting concerns and the realization that the ships will come whether Arctic people approve of it or not, Harry Brower Jr., chair of the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission, pointed to the success of the conflict avoidance agreement that has been in place between whalers and the oil and gas industry since 1986, and which is negotiated and renewed annually.

Jessica Lefevre, attorney for the Alaska Eskimo Whaling Commission expanded on the history of the conflict avoidance agreements. In the 70s and 80s the federal government began selling offshore leases but they didn't know that there are people in small craft on the water taking food. "We didn't want oil and gas ships run over our whaling boats," she said. The law books didn't yield any precedent of whalers and oil and gas companies at concontinued on page 6

Shell submits revisions to exploration plan

Last Thursday, Royal Dutch Shell submitted revisions to its approved Chukchi Sea Exploration plan to the Anchorage office of the federal Bureau of Ocean Energy Management.

Shell spokeswoman Megan Baldino said in an email to the Nome Nugget that the step was necessary to keep Shell's 2015 exploration options vi-

Baldino said the plan details the exploration program in the Chukchi Sea. There are some differences mostly concerning assets.

"Most notably, we now plan to use two rigs in the Chukchi Sea at the same time," Baldino wrote. "We've also bolstered our program with an anchor handler, new tugs and offshore supply

The rigs are the Noble Discoverer,

Chukchi Sea and the Transocean Polar

The ill-fated drill rig Kulluk, which ran aground near Kodiak was scrapped. Baldino confirmed that there are no plans to continue drilling in the Beaufort Sea next year and that Shell's focus remains on the Chukchi Sea. Shell's new CEO Ben van Beurden told reporters in a conference in June that the company is ready to continue exploration when the regulatory agencies are allowing them to do so.

According to a report by the online publication FuelFix, Shell began to resurrect a worker camp in Barrow and deliveries of equipment and supplies are being made.

"As for decision, there is no timeline," wrote Baldino. "Any final decision to go forward will depend on successful permitting, clearing any legal obstacles, and our own assessment that we can move forward with a program that meets all the conditions to proceed safely and responsibly.'

Last year, Shell paid $1.1 million in fines to the Environmental Protection Agency because of air pollution permit violations while drilling in the Beaufort Sea and Chukchi Sea in 2012.

However, in order to continue exploration drilling in the Chukchi Sea, several things need to happen.

First, the Bureau of Ocean Energy Management needs to prepare a Supplemental Environmental Impact Statement to address deficiencies identified by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in the 2007 Final Environmental Impact Statement for Chukchi Lease Sale

John Callahan spokesman for BOEM in Anchorage said in an email, that BOEM is working to release a 2014, a Final Supplemental EIS in early February 2015, and a Record of Decision in March 2015.

"Should the Record of Decision affirm the sale of the parcels which Shell proposes to explore, BOEM will begin its official review of Shell's exploration plan for the 2015 drilling season, which will include an environmental analysis and opportunity for public review," wrote Callahan.

Although the agency will begin informal review of the revised exploration plan, it will not formally process it until then.

"Between receipt of Shell's Exploration Plan and the March 2015 decision, BOEM will informally review the EP and hold meetings with Shell," wrote Callahan.

"Due to the nature of the review. BOEM may make multiple requests for draft Supplemental EIS in October additional information and subsequent modifications to the EP. The review will include compliance of the EP with BOEM air quality regulations, and BOEM will informally discuss the EP with other Federal and State of Alaska regulators '

Only when the supplemental EIS on the lease has been OK'd and the lease and the exploration plan formally granted can the Bureau of Safety and Environmental Enforcement issue a drilling permit, said BSEE regional director Mark Fesmire in an email.

"By court order, BOEM can not act on that plan until after it completes a supplemental EIS on the lease and the Secretary grants the leases in light of the court-ordered environmental work.

"We will not issue a drilling permit without an approved EP," Fesmire flict. The federal agencies were not helpful either. "So in our desperation we called up the oil companies." Lefevre said. The result is remarkable. Since 1986, whalers and oil companies and other stakeholders on the water meet and without much bureaucratic red tape, come up with a conflict avoidance agreement year after year.

"But then people started showing up in cruise ships," Lefevre said.

That's part of the reason why the AMMC was formed. "We represent the hunters on the water as they are gathering food," Lefevre said. Shipping is going to impact them. "Our job is to push back so that these hunters have the space to hunt marine mammals."

Common ground

Dr. David Steris with the US Coast Guard held a presentation about Southeast Alaskan harbor safety committees. In the Southeast, conflict exists between the fishing industry, the cruise ship industry and charter boats. Dr. Steris said their consensus-based approach has resulted in voluntary waterway user guidelines to minimize conflict between the users.

An often mentioned issue is how to build a reliable communication network and to have the Alaska Marine Exchange set up an Automatic Information System for communities to monitor ship traffic through their waterway. The Marine Exchange of Alaska is a nonprofit maritime organization based in Juneau. Retired United States Coast Guard Captain Ed Page founded the Marine Exchange in 2001. The Alaska Marine Exchange was established to broker information that aids safe, secure, efficient and environmentally sound maritime operations in Alaska. To this end, the Marine Exchange operates a vessel-tracking network comprising about 120 Automatic Identification System (AIS) stations and Marine Safety stations in Alaska. One of them is set up at UAF Northwest Campus Marine Advisory Program and can be seen online at the UAF MAP website. Others are in the process of being installed at Gambell and Savoonga.

Ed Page introduced the technology to the audience. "There should be no more surprises," Page said. "We have technology right now to see where the vessels are." There are efforts to develop custom-made transponders for smaller vessels that would receive AIS information and weather information.

The challenge is not technology but to make it right, Page said. The AWSC would not have regulatory powers, but could suggest best management practices, and voluntary mitigation measures that the industry would be willing to sign up on, including foreign vessels on innocent passage through the Bering Strait that could include those measures in their voyage planning. "This is a manageable threat," Page said.

Paul Fuhs agreed. Fuhs said although those best practices promulgated by the AWSC would be non-binding, they would be published by the Coast Guard, picked up by insurance companies and could evolve into binding laws. "Don't be afraid that this is not a regulatory body," Fuhs said. "Those recommendations can be turned into regulation later."

Fuhs addressed the nuts and bolts of forming the committee, including the formation of a mission statement, drawing up the articles of incorporation, coming up with a budget and to develop a funding strategy. "The best outcome of this meeting would be to come up with a steering committee, go to the Legislature to fund the AWSC and to begin work next spring," Fuhs said.

Representation

Discussions around representation began with the lack of the definition of where an Arctic Waterway begins and thus who should be represented on the AWSC. Matt Ganley, BSNC Vice President Resources and External Affairs, said that most coastal lands along the Alaskan west coast are owned by village or regional corporations and, thus, they should have a seat at the table as the AWSC is formed.

A tribal representative from the North Slope inquired about the inclusion of tribes.

But who to include?

Julie Raymond-Yakoubian said, "People who bear the greatest risk should have greater representation on the group and in the process. It's not just marine mammals but also other marine resources such as fish, salmon, clams, even sea peaches."

It was pointed out that not many industry representatives were present and outreach is needed for oil, gas, fishing, cargo shipping and other maritime transportation industry in-

Charlie Brower Jr. said his great concern is food security, but that he would be uncomfortable to speak for Aleutian Island residents. Jack Omelak with the Alaska Nanuuq Commission reiterated that he didn't want subsistence users' voices diluted. There was tangible apprehension that food security would be run over if an equitable voting system and structure within the AWSC was not developed.

The meeting ended with the commitment that AMMC would carry on the efforts. US Coast Guard spokesperson Kody Stitz said that the meeting achieved the goal to go forward with the creationo of a AWSC. "That committee can then speak in one voice to the Coast Guard and that voice gets louder and more clearly heard," Stitz said. "We have regulatory authority and as we can get stakeholders to work together, we can take their recommendations or traffic schemes and publish them." The main topic, he said, is how to protect subsistence users from adverse affects. "The Coast Guard is very interested how this can be solved as a whole Arctic solution," he said.

After the meeting, Mayor Michels said it will require a lot of work to get the AWSC off the ground. She pointed out the need to define the Arctic. Also, she saw the AWSC as a venue to incorporate measures advantageous to Nome that were identified in the Coast Guard's Bering Strait Port Access Route Study traffic scheme. Michels also mentioned that the AWSC could identify areas to be avoided by vessel traffic.

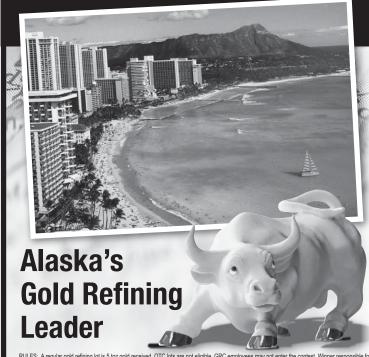

Nome Port Expansion Projects Manager Joy Baker also attended the meeting and said that the AWSC is a good idea. "Nome and the entire region can benefit from an AWSC, in allowing local input, in collaboration with industry and regulators, to create policies and regulations that will effectively manage the safe development of Arctic waters, while providing significant protection to the environment and marine sea life," she wrote in an email to the Nugget. "Responsible development of the Arctic will further increase activity at the Port of Nome and other Alaskan Ports, all of which are strong economic drivers within their communities. I thought the meeting in Anchorage was an effective "kickoff" to the creation of an AWSC, but additional efforts will be needed to further define the committee composition and various work groups needed to get started."

The Arctic Marine Mammal Coalition offered to facilitate the next step and continuing to build from the momentum that has already been established.

On Monday, AMMC chair Willie Goodwin emailed the Nugget that the organization offered to host a Steering Committee meeting and has already sent a letter to the USCG voicing their intent to do so. The date, time and location are not vet ment of economic development and a healthy environment, public safety and transparency of process in their vision statement. According to commission documents, the Alaska Arctic policy is to ensure that Alaskan Arctic indigenous peoples, their culture and values will be respected; that communities remain resilient despite climate change, that health and social well being are promoted and that communities benefit from economic development activities.

The policy is also to manage fisheries and wildlife for abundance, to build capacity through science and research; and to consult and include Arctic residents in science, employment, training, and a say in the permitting and regulatory process. It also aims to strengthen disaster prevention and emergency response by coordinating public and private investment for infrastructure and equipment.

The AAPC identified four strategic recommendations: To address the infrastructure gap in the Arctic; to strengthen Alaska's science and research agenda; to increase response capacity to increased ship traffic and to promote sustainable development not to exclude a healthy culture, society and environment.

Daunting task

While the AAPC went over the draft of a policy bill, and reviewed the implementation plan and strategic recommendations, it became clear that there is still a lot of work to be done as exemplified in a discussion centered on climate change and communities' responses to it.

Asked about the "emotional" report related to a workshop on climate change, Commissioner Reggie Joule's staff member Christine Hess said, "People are feeling overwhelmed and are unable to deal with problems. There is no money to deal with erosion problems, there are all kinds of food security issues that climate change brings, including changes in game migration, ice and snow changes."

Bethel Senator Lyman Hoffman said that yes, communities already know about all that, but how is this going to be addressed in the policy? "Erosion affects people's lives today," he said. Some communities such as Newtok and Shishmaref pondered the possibility of relocating. "Do we have in our implementation plan what needs to be done? Or do we need to be more specific on climate change and the effects of erosion?"

At a federal level, there is no agency that funds relocating entire communities and the state does not finance relocation projects either. Denise Michels, who works as transportation director at Kawerak Inc. affirmed that funding is hard to come by but it sometimes takes a relatively small investment to fortify a community for the short term.

Liz Qaulluq Moore, ANCSA corporation representative, also testified to the effect that communities begin to shape their own responses.

"We talk about communities like Kivalina, but they don't sit around and wait for solution," Moore said.

"They don't get any attention from the state or the federal government either, but when communities start stepping up and propose solutions, they should be heard."

Yet, there is no comprehensive and equitable mechanism for climate change endangered communities to assure their survival

Lack of public participation

Last week's meetings included public testimony, but the meetings were not advertised to the broad Nome public in print or radio media outlets beforehand.

Commission member Cathy Giessel, Senator from Anchorage, inquired whether Alaskans know that their input is taken, what the deadline is and how it should be submitted. "I'm not sure folks know that they can do that," Giessel said.

AAPC executive director Nikoosh Carlo answered that details are on the commissions' website www.akarctic.com and asked the present legislators to reach out to their constituents to spread the word.

In public testimony, Nomeites Tim Smith and Chuck Wheeler were the only private persons to voice their opinions.

Eskimo Walrus Commission executive director Vera Metcalf asked the commission to include the virtues of traditional knowledge in their report.

University of Fairbanks Vice Chancellor for University and Student Advancement Michael Sfraga spoke to emphasize the role UAF plays in Arctic research. "We are the number one institution on the planet for scientific citations in regards to Arctic related efforts," Sfraga said. "We just recently briefed NATO. We should provide our state and its residents with that information, not just the State Department."

Sfraga added that a Japanese delegation recently visited UAF to help guide and formulate Japan's Arctic Policy. "We should be doing that for us, for Alaska," Sfraga said.

Sfraga also expressed support for Alice Rogoff's event "Arctic Imperative" and pledged support to bring it back.

A representative from the Alaska Oil and Gas Association stepped up to the microphone and said she appreciated the Commission's focus on the Arctic

Her role attending the meetings in

Nome and Kotzebue was to gather information for AOGA members on the intent and objectives of the commission.

Kawerak CEO and President Melanie Bahnke lauded the group for contemplating a continuation of an Arctic policy team after the AAPC's task of drafting a policy recommendation and bill is complete. "Arctic policy deliberations will not come to an end when your report is finalized," she said. "I ask that you establish an on-going body to advise and guide the legislature and administration on Arctic policy issues."

She also asked for support to add a third person to the federal Arctic "A-Team", currently consisting of retired U.S. Coast Guard Admiral Robert J. Papp and Fran Ulmer. "There is a need to add someone who lives in the Arctic, who is from the Arctic, and who is Alaska Native, to be a liaison for Alaska Natives," Bahnke said.

Bahnke also pointed out the lack of funding attached to the draft of the Arctic Policy bill. "Many of you are in a position to ensure that your own plan recommendations are funded. Fund them," Bahnke said.

The perfect storm for the Arctic is brewing. Fantastic resource development opportunities in form of oil, gas and minerals are said to be locked up in the Arctic.

However, most rural Arctic communities are not living anywhere near the standards of modern civilization, lacking even basic water and sewer services.

A survival of these communities is only possible by a mixed cash and subsistence economy, where subsistence has nutritional as well as cultural and traditional value.

Fouling the environment that sustains marine mammals or animals hunted for food and clothing could mean devastation for rural coastal communities.

Melanie Bahnke pointed out that it would be the Arctic residents who bear the greatest risk if any spills or pollution happens. But also recognizing that Alaska Natives are very capable to adapt to new realities, she points to Native Corporations using 8(a) opportunities of government contracting and the concept of the CDQ groups. "We are playing catchup, but when given an opportunity, we go from having a seat at the back of the bus, to driving the bus, then being the owner of a fleet of buses. We need to figure out what the opportunities are for our Arctic communities," she said.

Bahnke also pleaded for synchronization among federal, state and tribal entities in order to have common Arctic strategies.

"Anything that happens in the Arctic will require a combination of federal and state investments, and will affect tribes and people in the Arctic. We must be willing to work together from the beginning," she said

The meeting continued in Kotzebue the next day.

Institute of the North Executive Director Nils Andreassen said that a draft bill will be presented during the Week of the Arctic meetings in Nome, Kotzebue and Barrow on October 6 to 11.

The next meeting of the Alaska Arctic Policy Commission to iron out final recommendations and to finalize the report is scheduled for November 16 to 17 in Anchorage.

Nome schools see gains in district report card

By Kristine McRae

At last week's school board work session, Janeen Sullivan, testing specialist for the district, presented board members with an overview of the data used to gauge the progress of districts around the state. Sullivan shared results determined in part by last spring's Standards Based Assessment test scores. They generate points for formulas and ratios that are used to determine overall progress of a particular grade, and hence, the entire school. For those points, the school is given an Alaska School Performance Index score, and that score which is then converted into a rating of between one and five stars.

The outcome of this year's number crunching is encouraging. Many individual grade levels saw an increase in reading, writing, and math scores. Fifth and sixth grades saw record high scores in reading. The sixth grade also got its highest writing score to date. The tenth grade also saw some record high scores: 74 percent proficient in writing and 72 percent proficient in math (a nearly 20 percent gain from the year before). Nearly 80 percent of tenth graders were proficient in reading, which is its second-ever highest score.

Test attendance, Sullivan told the board, was impressive. "If we hadn't met the 95 percent participation rate, those kids absent would have been counted as below proficient," Sullivan said. "But we did a good job of getting the kids in to test."

Other test summaries by grade level include the third grade showing 70 percent proficient in reading, writing, and math (up from last year); fourth graders tended to be in the 60's, which is similar to the year before; fifth and sixth graders saw an overall rise; seventh graders were up a bit on reading but down in math from their sixth grade scores; eighth graders scored 51percent proficient in writing and 46 percent in math, which is also down a bit. The cohort which moved from eighth to ninth grade dropped to 60 percent proficient in reading, 57percent in writing, and 28 percent in math.

In addition to the SBA scores, other factors that determine a school's ASPI points are overall attendance and graduation rate. This year Nome Elementary School received four stars, up from three stars last year. Nome-Beltz Jr/Sr high held steady at three stars, Anvil City Science Academy and Nome Extensions Home School Program each again earned five stars.

Because of its transient population, the Nome Youth Facility continues to receive one star. Students who leave and re-enroll somewhere else are not tracked. For the past three years the actual graduation rate at NYF has been the highest in its history.

Nome schools superintendent Steve Gast was optimistic about this year's results. "These are real encouraging numbers," said Gast. "Lots of improvement across the board." For all the good results, this is the last year that the state will use the SBA test results as a measure of academic health.

Next year, the state will use the Academic Measure of Progress. At the high school level, students will no longer take the high school graduation qualification exams, known as the HSGQE; rather, students will be required to take either the ACT, SAT, or WorkKeys Assessment.

Those students who had been denied a diploma and received only a certificate of completion because of failure to pass the HSGQE can apply to the school to receive a diploma if they've met the other graduation requirements. NPS technology director Robin Johnson introduced the district's updated, comprehensive website, which will soon house a link to the test data results.

Highlites from Nome-Beltz

By Harlan Heinrich, Principal

This past week has been a wonderful beginning of the new school year. We are off to a great start with 259 students enrolled. I have had an opportunity to meet some of you and I am looking forward to meeting more of you as the school year progresses.

A group of Sami Reindeer herders from Finland were here at Nome-Beltz Tuesday August 26 during 6th period, 1:35-2:25, for an assembly to give a presentation to the students and staff regarding their cultural practice of herding reindeer. This group is comprised of vocational school students studying in the "Reindeer Herder Curriculum" and they are here to share part of their culture as they gain a better understanding of ours.

Nome-Beltz High School is partnering with UAF Northwest Campus in offering Dual Credit classes this semester. These classes are: ESK F115 NP1 3 Credit Conversational Inupia with 14 students

HLTH F105 & & HLTH F122 NPI with 18 students.

We will have our "Open House" on September 10 from 6:30 to 7:30 PM. Take advantage of this opportunity to meet your child's classroom teachers.

Reminder to Parents— we do have a cell phone / personal electronics free learning environment for our students and classrooms. This has been a policy in the student handbook for a couple years now. Students may use cell phones and mp players before school, at lunchtime, and after school.

RUNNING IN STYLE - Runners in the Prom Run blast off the starting line in Icy View in anticipation of mud and mayhem.

Creatively clad runners brave wind and rain in second annual Prom Run

By Keith Conger

The residents of south Icy View who looked out of their windows early Saturday afternoon may have been shocked to see a procession of local runners decked out in dresses, ties, and sport coats, and even a horse, bounding around the tundra trails.

Nome-Beltz cross country running head coach Crystal Tobuk explained the phenomenon by saying that nearly every year the Nanooks team has a free, non-travel weekend in the middle of the season. This gap in the schedule lead to the creation of a fun race called The Prom Run. The number one requirement for the event is that participants must wear formal attire. The rules, however, don't specify which gender must wear which garb.

The annual Prom Run has become an important fundraiser for the team. Despite a downpour, the team sold baked goods and hot tamale sandwiches under their events tent on the Old Osborne Road.

According to Tobuk, the other goal of the Prom Run is to keep the kids focused on the race season. "This is definitely an event that keeps us moving," says Tobuk, "and keeps running fun."

The Prom Run is a non-competitive, 2-mile race that is open to the community. Contestants do two laps on a challenging course that takes them through willows and crosses Dry Creek a multitude of times. One particularly difficult stretch had the participants knee-deep in water.

The first runners to cross the finish line are "crowned" and become part of the Prom Court. This year the Queen and Princess were Mallory Conger and Ava Earthman, both 12, who used their skijor dogs to help speed them around the course.

Crowning the Prom King presented a tough decision as Wilson

Hoogendorn, 15, crossed the line on the shoulders of his brother Oliver, 17. Race officials determined that in the case of a tie, the most vertical runner would be crowned King.

This year a new Clydesdale category was added. Diana Haecker, riding her horse Snowman (not really a Clydesdale, but a Curley), took the crown in that division. Snowman was wearing his running shoes and enjoyed his first race in the Nome Triple Crown.

The Prom Run helped get the Nanook runners ready for the busy upcoming weekend. A small contingent of varsity high school runners will be traveling south to run in the ACS Invitational on Friday at Cheney Lake, and then head to Palmer for their invitational on Saturday. A second group, made up of both high school and junior high athletes, will be competing in Kotzebue on Saturday.

It is not too late for students to run. Tobuk says, "The team still has kids who are joining. We are not turning anyone away."

Those interested in being on the team need to complete a physical, and fill out the necessary paperwork.

Just Say No!

Dear Sitnasuak Shareholders:

It has become apparent that current Sitnasuak directors feel it is okay to disregard the most basic tenets of ethics in pursuit of self-promotion. Our Native company is being taken over by a cabal of directors who speak of transparency and abiding by Inupiaq values—but continually act in ways which disregard the shareholders and the values they encompass. We are speaking directly about the use of discretionary proxies by Jason Evans to elect Trudy Sobocienski to the board of directors at the last annual meeting, held May 31, 2014 in Nome, Alaska.

Jason failed to disclose to Sitnasuak shareholders that Trudy is being sued by Deloycheet, the Native corporation of Holy Cross, Alaska. This lawsuit addresses the very aspect of a dependable director: trust. Trudy had an opportunity to inform shareholders of this lawsuit before and during the election. Instead, she chose to hide it, hoping that no one would find out about it until afterward. Now that the information is slowly being revealed, Trudy has another opportunity to regain the trust of shareholders by informing them of her conduct and the circumstance that led to this lawsuit.

Why would Jason risk his own reputation with shareholders to elect, by proxy, someone in this legal situation? What does he hope to gain by granting those proxy votes to Trudy? We fear that there is a group of directors who wish to control the board and therefore control Sitnasuak for their own personal gain. This group does not have the best interest of shareholders at the forefront of their thinking and actions. It is not in the best interest of the company to elect a director who is being sued over the misuse of $400,000 by another Native corporation. This calls into question every action taken by this board.

It is our sincere hope that shareholders will become active in the process of holding directors accountable for the decisions being made

We would also like to encourage shareholders to Just Say No! if a board candidate asks you to sign a discretionary proxy. It is one thing to campaign for yourself, it is another thing to gather votes on behalf of others and "bestow" them to whomever you favor, or whomever you believe will act to your benefit while serving on the board.

Directors of the Sitnasuak Board are elected to represent the shareholders. Please make sure that you voice your concerns. Let directors know that you expect honest and well-informed decisions, free of deal-making and personal favor.

Thank you.

Morgan medals at Moose's Tooth Marathon

By Keith Conger

One of the main messages from high school athletics programs is that athletes can use sports as healthy activities for the rest of their lives. Nome's Nick Morgan, 19, has had a good start in that direction as he participated in his first marathon running race in Anchorage on August 17.

Morgan completed the 26.2-mile Moose's Tooth Marathon in a time of 3 hours, 36 minutes, 28 seconds, while averaging 8 minutes and 16 seconds per mile. He earned a bronze medal in his age group, and was the 30th of the nearly 300 people to cross the finish line. That effort placed him near the top 10 percent overall.

Morgan was a 2013 graduate of Nome-Beltz High School and is currently a sophomore engineering student at UAF. This summer he had completed a 16-week marathon training course, called the Non-Runners Marathon Trainer, with his mother Christine Schultz.

The title of their guidebook might be a bit misleading for this mother/son duo. By completing the Moose's Tooth Marathon in 5 hours 29 minutes, Schultz, 49, checked off career marathon number three. Morgan was no stranger to running either. He ran competitively for two years in junior high and was an accomplished four-year high school cross country runner who had competed with the Nanooks team on the state level.

Morgan's summer running results, which also included a fourthplace finish in the 12.5-mile Anvil Mountain Run back in July, are perhaps showing that the short high school running distance may not be his true calling. "Nick didn't medal in high school," said Schultz, "but he was always in the hunt. Maybe he was meant to be a distance runner."

The Moose's Tooth Marathon, formerly known as Humpies Classic Marathon, was one of the events in the Big Wild Life Runs weekend. The 2000 runners in Anchorage had a smorgasbord of participatory race choices, ranging from a one-mile run to a 49-kilometer (30 mile) run.

Norton Sound - Kotzebue fish report for late August

By Jim Menard, ADF&G

SALMON: Norton Sound

Preliminary Norton Sound commercial salmon harvest figures this season are: 280 kings, 104,000 chums, 180,000 pinks, 370 reds and 102,000 silvers.

The silver salmon harvest has exceeded 100,000 silvers for the first time since 2008 and only the sixth time in history. The silver harvest may finish as high as fourth greatest.

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 60 kings, 146 reds, 32,500 chums, 82,200 pinks and 57,000 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest ranks ninth

North River Tower – Camp J.B.-Escapement goals: King 1,200-2,600; Chum-No goal established; Pink 25,000; Silver 550-1,100 (aerial survey goal) – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through August 28 were 2,300 kings, 11,700 chums, 144,000 pinks and 4,300 silvers. The average historical 90% point of the silver run past the tower has been August 31.

Unalakleet River Floating Weir – No weir escapement goals yet established – cooperative project; Fish & Game, Native Village of Unalakleet, United States BLM and NSEDC. Major funding provided by U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service – Office of Subsistence Management.

Project operations were completed August 27 cumulative counts were 1,000 kings, 54,500 chums, 1.2 million pinks, 200 reds and 44,000 silvers.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 16 kings, 39 reds, 28,700 chums, 33,000 pinks and 18,000 silvers. All kings harvested were not sold, but kept for personal use. The silver harvest ranks seventh highest.

Shaktoolik Sonar/Tower – No escapement goals yet established – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

The tower crew was unable to count since July 13 due to high water, but did get the sonar unit set back up to count on August 4. Cumulative counts through August 21 should be considered minimal for all species and were 2,000 kings, 53,000 chums, 423,000 pinks and 5,500 silvers. Sonar counts have not yet been apportioned by species for the last week of August.

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 70 kings, 15 reds, 13,000 chums, 28,000 pinks and 9,000 silvers. The silver harvest is a record and nearly two-thirds above the previous record of 5,485 silvers harvested last year.

Elim Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 98 kings, 129 reds, 16,800 chums, 28,200 pinks and 14,500 silvers. The silver harvest is a record surpassing the previous record harvest of 10,180 silvers in Kwiniuk River Tower – Camp Joel - Escapement goals: King 300-550; Chum 11,500 – 23,000; Pink 8,400; Silver 650-1,300 (aerial survey goal). Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC. Cumulative counts through August 28 were 429 kings, 40,000 chums, 326,000 pinks and 12,700 silvers. The silver count only trails the record run of 2006 by 3,000 silvers and there was no commercial fishing in 2006 because of a lack of a market. The average historical third quarter point for silvers past the tower is August 27.

Golovin Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through late August was 28 kings, 44 reds, 13,500 chums, 7,900 pinks and 3,600 silvers. The silver harvest ranks fourth greatest. The record harvest was 5,586 silvers in 2010 and last year's harvest was second best with 5,362 silvers.

Fish River Tower – No escapement goals established – cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Cumulative counts through August 28 were 900 kings, 45,000 chums, 220,000 pinks, 15 reds and 17,000 silvers.

Nome Subdistrict

The latest subsistence set gillnet fishing period in fresh waters closes at 6 p.m. Saturday, August 30. Effective September 1, all fresh water subsistence areas are open to set gillnetting 7 days a week. Check the back of the Nome Subdistrict subsistence salmon permit for the subsistence areas where set gillnetting is allowed and the catch limits by river. Beach seining is not allowed.

In the marine waters subsistence set gillnet fishing is open 7 days a week with no catch limits.

Nome River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 2,900 - 4,300; Pink 13,000 - Fish & Game project with assistance from NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 28 were 6 kings, 5,500 chums, 96,000 pinks, 25 reds and 1,000 silvers. The silver count is in the bottom third of the 14 years since the project was extended to count the silver run, but over 1,000 silvers were observed by an aerial survey estimate on August 29. The average historical midpoint is August 28.

Snake River Weir - Escapement goal: Chum 1,600 - 2,500 - A cooperative project between Fish & Game and NSEDC.

Cumulative counts through August 28 were 10 kings, 4,000 chums, 19,500 pinks, 80 reds and 430 silvers. The silver count is in the bottom third of the 13 years of weir counts, but hundreds of silvers were observed below the weir in an aerial survey estimate on August 29. The average historical midpoint is August 26.

Port Clarence District

Pilgrim River Weir - Escapement goal (aerial survey at Salmon Lake & Grand Central tributary to Salmon Lake): Red 4,000 – 8,000 – Cooperative project; NSEDC with assistance from Fish & Game.

Project operations were completed on August 27. Cumulative counts were 50 kings, 25,500 chums, 4,200 pinks, 9,700 reds and 430 silvers.

The red run this year was comprised of an early surge that had a majority of 6-year-old fish and a late surge that had a majority of 4-year-old fish.

One possible explanation may have been that the 6-year-olds (2008 escapement - 20,452 reds) had good survival and the 5-year-olds (2009 escapement - 953 reds) did not do well as fry in Salmon Lake competing with the likely much more numerous and larger fry from the preceding year. Although the 4-yearolds (2010 escapement – 1,654 reds) did not come from a much larger escapement than the 5-year-olds they obviously had much better survival rates. Likely there were fewer fry from the preceding year in Salmon Lake to compete with the 2010 brood

Kotzebue

The 2014 Kotzebue commercial salmon finished with the second greatest harvest and ex-vessel value. Preliminary harvest figures were 633,000 chum salmon and an ex-vessel value of 2.93 million dollars. The 2014 season trailed only the 1981 harvest of 677,000 chum salmon and an ex-vessel value of 3.25 million dollars. In 1981 there were 187 permit holders participating in the fishery, but in 2014 there were only 95 permit holders. This was the first time since 1988 that the ex-vessel value was above one million dollars.

This year's run was powered by the incredible Kobuk River chum salmon run that came early and strong and finished late and strong. The Noatak River chum salmon run comes in later than the Kobuk River run and was a good run also, but did not finish out as strong. Age composition of samples taken from the chum salmon commercial catch and test fishing catch showed a huge run of four-year-olds.

landers when they practiced for the Wales Dance Festival, searching for the descendants of the Sámi who brought reindeer and reindeer herding to this area, finding and interviewing Kim Gray and her family, visiting Carrie McLain Museum, shopping in Maruskiya's, tasting muktuk, our new friends, our classmates Theresa, Michele, Harvey, Randall and Francis.

And we will always miss the kind and friendly people we met at their work, homes, the grocery store, on the streets, in the cafés, on the beach, by the rivers, and who determinedly learned how to pronounce our difficult names.

We came all the way to Nome to see and learn what does our own livelihood, reindeer herding, look like here, 3,100 miles from home, right on the other side of the North

It was another courageous group of Sámi people 100 years ago, who first brought reindeer to the Seward Peninsula, and taught the locals our traditional skills of herding reindeer and living off the only animal that provides resources for humans to permanently dwell all around the Circumpolar Arctic inlands.

We stayed in Nome and surroundings for a longer time than a usual tourist, but we didn't have a chance to see reindeer in a corral. For us it would have been a new experience to see velvet antlers cut. We understand that producers answer to demand, because all we reindeer owners are dependent on the consumers, their needs and money.

For a reindeer herder the wellbeing of the reindeer is a priority, though, and we believe cutting antlers with skin, blood circulation and sense corresponds cutting a limb. We hope reindeer owners, organizations and government here would work together for producing meat rather than velvet antlers. Producing reindeer meat is ethical (the animals can live their lives free in natural pasture) and could contribute to producing safe quality food lo-

Along meat production you get many valuable non-food products from the reindeer. Hides, leg skins and hard antlers give additional income and create new industry. For example, appreciation of reindeer leather is extremely high nowadays, and last season we sold the best hides for as much as 26 dollars each. We only needed to salt them.

But most, we wish the Seward Peninsula reindeer herders would experience the joy and security of working together. Cooperation is fun and gives you the freedom to concentrate in the tasks that you manage best, and makes it possible to involve the children in the work from the very beginning. Also, it would then be possible to attend the herds more often and prevent losses, be it caused by the caribou or the predators. More herding would make the reindeer themselves easier to handle, too, when they get more used to human presence.

Now it is time to leave this beautiful place and bid adieu to you, all you kind and welcoming people. We look forward to following your life through the internet and such, and Nome will always be a part of our lives. Thank you, farewell! You are heartily welcome to visit us in exchange!

Dear Editor,

I am a mother of a beautiful 11year-old daughter. We have an ongoing problem with very rude, awful name calling here in Shishmaref. My daughter has been called these names since she was in grade school. I am to the point where I do not know what to do anymore. This latest incident was this weekend where a much younger girl had called my daughter "blackie" a while ago this same child had called her "brownie' and we did not do anything we just told my daughter to ignore her.

When she called her "blackie" this weekend I went to the girl and told her to say sorry to my daughter that you shouldn't call my daughter any hateful words just because she's darker than you. My daughter went back outside next door to play, soon enough I didn't see her, I opened the window to look and the girl she was playing with ran to my window and said she's hiding under her house. I looked and saw the father of the girl who called my daughter the awful name looking around.

I ran out and went to my daughter and told her she does not need to hide and hear these awful names. As I was walking away my mother was at her open window, this father yelled at me saying I shouldn't yell and threaten his child. I turned as I was walking with my daughter and told him I never did, that his daughter called my daughter "blackie" he defended her and yelled at me. After I got in and we had to call the VPSO because my mother did not feel safe especially when she saw him walking after me yelling, and this is a big guy. What do we do? Do we just sit here and listen to these hateful words being said to my 11-year-old daughter by young children? Do we just let them continue to call her these awful "brownie"

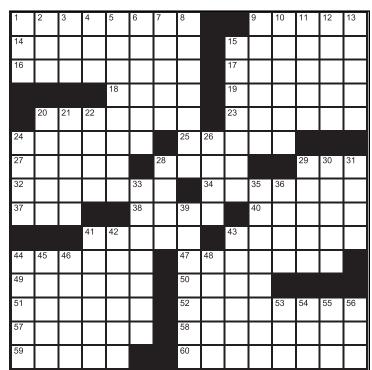

All school year last year she was called these names by an older girl in her classes, in practice, in open gym and outside the school. It got to the point where she came to me crying saying she wants to move back to Nome to be near her daddy, who is the same color. She asked me why is she brown and I am white? I told her God made you perfect, you are beautiful, this is the way God made us.

Two years ago they had class showers once a week offered to students, one day as I was there to supervise her, she put soap on her bath sponge a second time, than a third time, I asked if she was almost done that its almost time for breakfast, she replied mom I'm not done I'm trying to take the brown off." I started to cry as she was finishing, as I was fixing her hair I told her "baby this is not dirt, It's not dirty, this is the color of your skin, God made you perfectly, you are beautiful." When this happened last year yet again I purchased a self-tanning lotion, she smiled very big. I just used it again after this incident happened this weekend, she had the biggest smile. I told her God made you perfect, there are people out there that have to pay lots of money to go tan or get spray tanned and you don't have to, look there are lots of people paying lots of money to look beautiful like

I ask you this, what do I do? Do I sit and listen as these children; yes I said children call my daughter these awful names just because she's darker than them? She is beautiful. She is dark. She is my daughter. I will defend her, I will stand up for her even though these parents call me crazy, I did not threaten another child, I will do anything to protect my child. I will self tan myself as continued on page 17

To tax or not to tax, that is the question

From where will the money come for essential city services? Those concerned with the high cost of alcohol abuse in the community suggested an increase in the taxes on alcohol in order to encourage healthier behavior. The City Council rejected this in part so that responsible drinkers and bar owners in our community would not be unfairly penalized.

Others concerned with the health risks from tobacco use suggested an increase in taxes as a way to encourage healthier behavior. This too was defeated despite some notable smokers saying that it was a good idea and might encourage them to smoke less.

With the sin tax defeated, the council now looks to the possibility of taxing non-profits. Hospitals, social service agencies and churches are asked to pay their fair share. There is a humorous logic to this approach. Let us not impose a sin tax to discourage drinking and smoking, but let us tax those who suggest that unhealthy behavior should be discouraged.

What would Jesus do? Certainly Jesus had no problem with responsible drinking. However in changing six stone jars of water into wine, he certainly bypassed any local sales tax by avoiding a direct purchase at the corner wine store in Cana. The more costly it is to purchase items in Nome, the more people will continue to look outside of Nome to stretch their budgets and make ends meet for the family.

When challenged directly over the issue of whether or not it was appropriate to pay taxes, Jesus looked at a coin bearing the image of Caesar and said, "Repay to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, and to God what belongs to God" (Matt 22:22). In Nome's early days, the city father's recognized the essential services provided by non-profits and were quick to render financial assistance to help in areas beyond the scope of city services. In looking to the past, let us not overlook the point of Jesus' teaching. The greater debt is owed to God who has given us everything.

When challenged over the payment of the Temple tax, Jesus acknowledged there was a special exemption (Matt. 17: 24-27). The Temple tax was meant for foreigners but Jesus nevertheless directed Peter to drop a hook into the sea and to find a coin with which to pay the tax. A tax on non-profits presumes that an organization can dip into the sea and pull money out without an impact on the essential services they provide. I would argue differently. Taxing non-profits can increase city revenue at the expense of less offered in the way of non-profit services.

City council members have a very difficult job in trying to find revenue sources as the cost of everything rises and the outside revenue sources appear to dwindle. Council members should be commended for their willingness to serve the public. For at the end of the day, as people debate the merit of who should or shouldn't be taxed, they are still faced with trying to answer the question, from where will the money come for essential city services?

often as I can to be there for my daughter; I will stand up for my child.

How do children have so much hate to use these words "brownie" "blackie" "darkie"? Why should my daughter continue to hear these awful words as she did at such a young age and continue as she gets older?

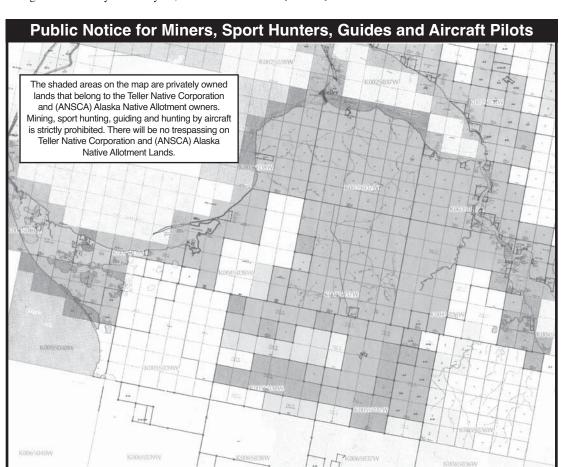

No child should go through this, to ask why she is brown and I am white, to wash herself three times as she tells me she's trying to wash the brown off, to hear these words said to her, no child should be bullied to this extent. There are suicides throughout the state year after year, not only in Alaska but also in the lower 48, just last year a 12-year-old committed suicide because of bullying. We need to stop this. We need to end it. No child should hear these awful names said towards them.

What do I do? Do I sit here and just listen to these children call my daughter these hateful names? Please stand up. Please help. Please talk to your children, talk to your nieces and nephews, talk to your grandchildren about name calling especially these awful names, for them to never to use them towards another child because they are darker.

Please remember these words hurt us also as a family we cry as we wonder why her, why these words? No child should hear these awful words just because they are darker. Children are precious, please help me and stand up, talk to your children about hurtful words that should never be called just because the child is darker.

Sincerely, Irene Ahgupuk Shishmaref, AK

Alaska State Troopers begin distributing NSEDC-funded thermal imaging cameras

All Norton Sound communities will receive devices, aiding in SAR operations

Thanks to a donation from Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, search and rescue teams in the Norton Sound region will have a powerful new tool when trying to find lost or overdue parties when time is of the essence. To assist with Search and Rescue operations, NSEDC donated 16 FLIR BHS Bi-Ocular handheld thermal imaging cameras to its 15 member communities, plus Shishmaref.

The Alaska State Troopers are now distributing the devices to Village Public Safety Officers for communities without a VPSO; the devices will be distributed to the local search and rescue groups. "These are a game changer," said Alaska State Trooper Sergeant Charles Cross. "Up to this point, we have been equipped with one thermal imaging device for the entire region. With a camera in each community, SAR teams will have quick access to a superior and easy-tofunction lifesaving device that will help in search efforts when our loved ones are missing.

At their meetings in Unalakleet in May, the NSEDC Board of Directors voted to supply each community with the thermal imaging cameras to assist with Search and Rescue (SAR) operations. The donation totaled just more than $150,000. "If these devices save one life, the investment is worth it,' Board Chairman Dan Harrelson said. The FLIR thermal imaging camera detects radiation and temperature differences, allowing searchers to see a warm body in total darkness, as well as through smoke and light fog. The device is weatherproof, water resistant and operates down to -40F and can detect a person from 1 1/4 mile dis-

"We'd like to thank NSEDC for their contribution to the Alaska State Troopers, the communities and public safety," Sergeant Cross said. "The department rarely receives contributions of this kind from private entities, and it shows NSEDC's dedication to the public and residents of the region.

The Alaska State Troopers responded to 31 reported incidents of missing persons in the past year from the Nome and Unalakleet posts. For more information on the impact the thermal imaging cameras will have on SAR operations, contact Trooper Sergeant Charles Cross at (907) 443-5525.

Museum Commission develops ideas for museum exhibits

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Museum and Library commission gathered for a work session to discuss museum exhibits and the stories the Carrie M. McLain Memorial museum will tell to visitors to the future Richard Foster Building.

Most of the discussions in the past centered on the location and financing the Richard Foster Building, which is to house the City's Carrie M. McLain Memorial museum, the Kegoayah Kozga Library and now also Kawerak's Beringia Cultural

Last week's session addressed the content of what the museum will show and how it will be presented.

"It was like a jam session of wild Nome stories," said Museum Director Laura Samuelson after the meeting. "You could tell that people on the commission love Nome and its history."

The task at hand was to begin forming the basis of the exhibits so that the writers of the exhibit firm PUBLIC can develop the content.

Commissioner John Handeland suggested that discussion about outside exhibits, should be addressed in a separate series of work sessions.

Museum and Library Commissioners Cussy Kauer (granddaughter of Carrie M. McLain), Charlie Lean, John Handeland, Howard Farley and Jake Kenick gathered around the table in the museum gallery, each with a copy of the 24 page exhibit overview in hand, reading from notes scribbled at the margins.

Also present was museum staff Laura Samuelson and Cheryl Thompson, and City Manager Josie Bahnke.

Bahnke briefed Commissioners, saying that the Nome Common Council approved the remainder of the design phase so work now can begin in earnest.

The City hired the museum exhibit firm PUBLIC to create exhibits, stories and captions.

The Council voted favorably on the first reading of an ordinance authorizing the issuance and sale by the City of utility revenue refunding bonds, in the principal amount not to exceed $2.6 million.

The Council passed a resolution authorizing the sale of the derelict vessel F/V Buddha Head to the U.S. Coast Guard.

Nome Port Expansion and Development Projects Manager Joy Baker explained to the Council that the vessel had been on City property in the boat yard for five years. It had gone through several owners' hands before the last owner, Ilene Self, quit naving storage fees to the city two

The council voted to authorize the sale.

The Council passed a resolution appointing election judges and clerks for the upcoming Oct. 7 municipal election, and setting their compensation. Qualified electors appointed to oversee the election are Francis Alvanna, Shirley Tisdale, Evelyn Omiak, Lon Swanson and Seiji Heck.

While the U.N. prepares for climate talks in Copenhagen, Denmark later this fall, these stark realities of a warming world are felt by the region's residents and a tangible apprehension of what the upcoming fall storms may bring.

The urgency to act prompted Norton Bay residents to draft the first climate change adaptation plan in

The Norton Bay Inter-Tribal Watershed Council, consisting of Elim, Koyuk, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet, cooperated with Hal Sheperd and Jessica Ryan of Laoch Consulting and the Model Forest Policy Program and its Climate Solutions University to formulate the "Climate Adaptation and Action Plan for the Norton Bay Watershed in Alaska".

This plan is the first climate change adaptation plan in Alaska to tackle specific problems of rural Alaskan villages impacted by global warming.

Rising seas, eroding shorelines and riverbanks, increases in air and water temperatures and changes to habitat are symptoms of a changing climate. Last year's November storm severely damaged the village of Kotlik and wreaked havoc with Unalakleet's and Shaktoolik's water and sewer lines.

When I sit down to watch my evening news these days, I am bombarded by the shameful ad from American Crossroads that accuses Senator Mark Begich of not paying women fairly. That ad is just another example of outsiders being willing to do or say anything to buy Alaska's Senate seat, no matter how far from the truth it is.

In this case, the ad is nothing but lies. When you actually compare the pay men and women in the same position receive in Mark's office, there's no difference.

So there you have it - figures don't lie, but liars will always figure.

I've known Mark Begich for a long time now – we served in the Assembly together for many years. And, as a woman, I think I'm a much better judge of how Mark Begich treats women in the workplace than Karl Rove.

Mark was always and still is a leader when it comes to treating women equally and making sure we receive the same opportunities as men.

The bottom line is no one understands the importance of paying women what they deserve like Mark. After all, his mother raised him and his five siblings by herself after his father died. Not to mention, his wife owns her own businesses and his campaign manager is a woman.

So don't let this ad fool you. As a friend pointed out, since when has Karl Rove cared about women's rights? The answer: only when it buys him votes. But make no mistake; Karl Rove and his buddy Dan Sullivan will only continue the Republican's agenda of discriminating against women if given the chance. Pat Abney

Dear Nancy,

We are Allan J. Okpealuk and Sally V. Okpealuk, parents of Waylon Z. Okpealuk who unexpectedly left us on August 13, 2014 by a 20 gauge shot to the left side according to the coroner's report. The trajectory was pointing downward from left to right. Both the coroner and investigating state trooper both ruled it a suicide. My wife and I think oth-

To us the scene was not right, for a suicide. No gunshot was heard, my wife is a light sleeper, the dog did not bark like she usually would when people come about. He was laying face down, like two people put him there for us to find him there. There was no gun by him; instead it was propped up against the wall and just a little pool of blood under him. The building where it happened is not more than 25 feet away from our bedroom window.

Two troopers came, took pictures, asked a few questions mostly to me and his mother, got the gun packed and our son into a body bag. They went straight to the airport and took him out. No investigation was done and they assumed that it was to be another suicide, automatically.

Some disturbing information we got was that a gunshot was heard on the west side of town. Kids talking to each other and an adult overheard it. We saw a pool of blood and what looked to be drag marks on the beach. I have come to learn what a mother's instinct is towards her children and loved ones, more than ever. She was a health aide and has dealt with suicides. I myself got the distinct feeling that he did not commit suicide. Someone shot him, with help, moved him into the shed to be found. We noticed a bump on his forehead, scratches on his face, coroners report abrasions on his buttocks he never had before. We are not accepting the troopers' and coroner's verbal and report on suicide. Instead we are looking at it as a homicide. If an investigation should be done

Get Involved With Local Government

Many Nomeites think the City government is running just fine, while others strongly disagree. So what are we to do? We can complain. We can attend council and board meetings. We can silently grumble and cry in our beer. We can also resolve to do something.

Many Nomeites have talents and skills that would lend themselves to making better government. Administrative skills and the organizational ability to maintain a household would be of value to folks on the school board. An understanding of energy and the ability to run a business would be helpful for the utility board. An ability to listen and solve problems would be useful for city council. Of course one does not have to run for office to contribute to our town. There are appointed commissions such as the planning commission and the mu-

We have a unique situation in Nome where many folks who are a vital part of our community live outside of the city limits and are ineligible to run for public office, so those of us who live inside the city limits must roll up our sleeves and get to work for the public good. The deadline for concerned citizens to get on the ballot is Monday Sept 15. Time is running out. Nothing is more disheartening than being asked to vote for a candidate who is unopposed. Get some backbone and sign up for office. -N.L.M.-

Research model shows decline in Pacific Walrus population

According to researchers of the US Geological Survey, the Pacific walrus population roughly halved between 1981 and 1999, the last year for which demographic data are available.

A recent study by scientists at the U.S. Geological Survey quantifies this historic population decline.

The 18-year decline identified by the study was not steady across that period. The decline was most severe in the mid-1980s, and then moderated in the 1990s.

If the moderating trend has continued up to the present time then the population might be stabilized. That, however, cannot be determined until more recent data are collected and analyzed. USGS is working to obtain the data needed to close the gap from collection of the last demographic data to the present day. This information will be vital because the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service is expected to determine whether the Pacific walrus should be listed as threatened under the Endangered Species Act in 2017.

Population dynamics, such as those investigated in this USGS study, will be a critical factor in the

"We integrated data from many sources," said lead author of the study research statistician Rebecca Taylor, with the USGS Alaska Science Center in Anchorage. "These included annual harvest records, six age structure surveys and five population size surveys conducted at various times over the 32 year study. The age structure data—collected between 1981 and 1999-were particularly informative, and enabled us to quantify the population decline and the birth and death rates that caused it.

Scientists think that past walrus population dynamics were affected mainly by harvest. Previous work suggests the population probably increased rapidly in the 1960s due to reduced hunting and reached or exceeded the size that could be supported by food resources in the late 1970s to early 1980s.

The decline quantified by the USGS analysis was probably initiated by this overabundance of walruses and exacerbated by a return to the relatively high harvests of the 1980s.

"The decline probably was prompted by these historical reasons, but we can't rule out other possible contributing factors," said Taylor. "The environment isn't static, and food may have become less available to walruses over time, possibly because of sea ice loss." Sea ice is important to walruses because they rest on it between dives to the ocean floor to eat clams and other invertebrates.

Taylor's analytical approach allows the incorporation of new data to understand more recent population dynamics. In 2013 and 2014, the USGS, USFWS and the Alaska Department of Fish & Game jointly surveyed walruses in Bering Strait and the Chukchi Sea to estimate current age structures and test a new method of estimating population size using a genetic mark-and-recapture approach. Another survey is planned for 2015.

In 2011, due to the combined threats of harvest and sea ice loss, the USFWS determined that listing of the population as threatened under the Endangered Species Act was warranted but was precluded by higher priorities. The agency is under a court order to make a listing decision in 2017.

This research effort is part of the USGS Changing Arctic Ecosystems Initiative.

The results of this new study were published in the online journal Marine Mammal Science on September 5, 2014.

Arctic Economic Council gets to work

Business leaders from the circumpolar region met in Iqaluit, Nunavut September 2-3 to establish the Arctic Economic Council, or AEC. The AEC is an independent organization created by the Arctic Council to facilitate Arctic business-to-business activities and responsible economic development, as well as sharing best practices, technological solutions, standards and other information.

"This is an important day for Arctic businesses. We will begin our work by focusing on four themes that are central to responsible and sustainable Arctic economic development: establishing strong market connections between the Arctic states; encouraging public-private partnerships for infrastructure investments; creating stable and predictable regulatory frameworks; and facilitating knowledge and data exchange between industry and academia." said Tom Paddon, the newly elected chair of the Arctic Economic Traditional indigenous knowledge, stewardship and a focus on small businesses will play a central role in AEC work. Industries such as fishing, herding, hunting and tourism are essential to Arctic business development and to the livelihoods of the peoples of the Arctic.

The AEC consists of 42 business representatives appointed by the Arctic states and indigenous organizations, including Gail Schubert, CEO of Bering Straits Native Corporation. The AEC has selected a small inaugural Executive Committee to guide its initial work to be lead by the chair Tom Paddon from Canada, vice chairs Tero Vauraste from Finland, Tara Sweeney from the United States who represents the Inuit Circumpolar Council, and Evgeny Ambrosov from Russia.

Initial administrative support for the AEC is being provided by Canada.

An offer by the Norwegian business community to support the AEC's administrative costs going forward was accepted in principle.

Canadian study says sending oilsands through NW Passage is feasible

CBC news reports that a Canadian study found it is feasible to send oilsands bitumen from the Northwest Territories in Canada to a port in the Arctic. CBC says the study commissioned last year by Alberta looked at the proposed link that would ship bitumen along the Mackenzie Valley to a port in Tuktoyaktuk, N.W.T.

It says shipping of bitumen via the Arctic Gateway Pipeline to Tuktoy-

WALRUS — Best recent estimates according to USGS and USFWS during a 2006 survey, using radio tags and aerial surveys, resulted in an estimate of 129,000 Pacific walrus in the surveyed area in the Bering Sea, which was half of the animals' potential habitats.

aktuk could start as early as next summer, using freight trains to Hay River, N.W.T., then barges the rest of the way down the Mackenzie River and on to Tuktoyaktuk.

The proposed pipeline would run from Fort McMurray, Alberta, to Tuktoyatuk, N.W.T., and would cover almost 1,500 miles.

The plan would require construction of both a pipeline and a port, but the report points out that Alberta companies would be in line to profit from such construction projects in N.W.T. From there, ships would transport the oil sands south through the Bering Strait. Ships from Tuktoyaktuk heading west towards the Pacific Ocean would encounter 'much more benign conditions than existed in past years,' says a report commissioned by Alberta that concludes sending oilsands bitumen to a port in the Arctic is feasible.

Nome Common Council [...] urges each individual in the community to take time on this day not only to 'go the extra mile' in his or her own life, but to also acknowledge all those who are inspirational in their efforts and commitment to make their organization, families, community, country, or world a better place."

In other business, City Manager Josie Bahnke offered good fiscal news, saying that preliminary numbers suggest that the City is breaking even as the fiscal year ended. She did not expand on the numbers, because they were only preliminary. In her report she updated the Council on the progress of the Richard Foster Building project: The building pad is near finished grade, the installation of the sewer main and building sewer are nearing completion, the piling material is in Nome, the steel framing is enroute to Nome and steel framing will commence in October through December.

ECI/Hyer continue on design development for the Kawerak space and exhibit designs are developed (see related story below).

In her written report, Bahnke mentioned that Museum Director Laura Samuelson will retire by the end of the month, on Sept. 30. Bahnke announced the need for museum closure from Sept. 22 through January to focus staff on content develop-

Bahnke thanked the Cross-Country Ski Team coached by Keith Conger for their cleanup of Middle Beach and the City's snow dump. "The skiers put 23 hours in to clean up the sites," Bahnke said.

Bahnke also brought the Council's attention to a few more trees that were donated by the Oman family. The Christmas trees were planted next to the Welcome to Nome gold pan at Anvil City Square and in front of City Hall.

Nome Joint Utility System Manager John Handeland updated the Council on NJUS projects. Handeland said his crew discovered contaminated soil near Crowley. Along the eastern side of the small boat harbor, NJUS crews worked to put in new lighting. While digging a trench to bury the primary power line, the crew discovered a small area of soil that that the environmental tester determined by field test had some kind of hydrocarbon level that slightly exceeded DEC threshold, Handeland said. "I don't believe what we found amounted to more than a dump truck load (less than 10 yards). A tester was on site for the entire project and discovered no other contaminated spots. Handeland was not sure of the source.

The contaminated soil was taken to a lined city storage site. There will be additional testing done to determine what, if anything, needs to be done to dispose of it, Handeland said.

NJUS is working with NBHS Maintenance Foreman Bill Potter on resolving the hole that had developed over a dry well next to the school's entrance

NJUS is working on installing a waterline on 5th Avenue between N and K Streets; the light crew is working on replacing utility poles on Front Street, with a target date for completion at the end of September. The crew also will replace a pole at the Nome Elementary School parking lot to accommodate for better traffic flow.

Handeland also asked the Council to spread the word that people should not be afraid to call NJUS when they hit a pole or get tangled in guy wire. "We had a car that got tangled up in a guy wire on a pole," said Handeland. He described how a driver backed up her truck and camper shell, hit the guy wire and when she tried to leave, got tangled in it. "We know that accidents happen, but please let us know," Handeland said. We're not looking for putting your name in the paper, but please report it so that we can maintain the safety for all involved."

The Council approved Mayor Denise Michels to have Larry Pederson continue to serve on the Planning Commission.

Councilman Matt Culley during Councilmen's Comments commended new NES Principal Paul Clark for greeting NES students as they come to school. "It's nice to see the Principal out there in the parking lot, with a safety vest, greeting the kids nice and politely as they come to school," Culley said. "It's just nice building is secured, but there are still funding requests out there, said Bahnke, including one for Sitnasuak Native Corporation for $500,000 to create the "Sitnasuak Room."

The commission tackled a 24-page document that spelled out six themes and a host of story ideas and "nuggets," which are shorter stories that expand on a detail in the story, as well as profiles. In all, the writer is going to tackle six themes, 53 stories, 165 nuggets, 56 profiles and about 300 captions and labels.

"The Edge of the World" is the overarching concept and theme that aims to tell stories about Nome's uniqueness. The concept document reads, "Nome is unique. Native Alaskan cultures have the remoteness of Nome and its unique geography; the harsh climate - including stories about the changing climate; its wildlife and flora; Native peoples; Explorers and the City. Another theme is "Work." This overview shows the influence of finding gold and the beginnings of Nome; "Mining the miners" concept of having a service industry develop in Nome; the influence of the military and government. A third theme is "Communications", which includes mail, lifestyles to adapt to the harsh climate; miners' tents, settlers and services that such as power, water and sewer that eventually were built to serve the needs of Nomeites.

Theme No.5 addresses "Food" and the hunting, fishing, gathering subsistence lifestyle before planes brought in food. The last theme shows "Leisure, Art and Play." It sheds light on the importance of dog racing and the Iditarod; the gambling and Nome's saloons; community in sports and at play; Eskimo dancing and drumming and Native as well as modern local art.

Each commissioner had about 20 minutes to give his or her thoughts about the themes and to add or emphasize ideas on what stories could serve a particular theme.

Under the theme "The Edge of the World", in the stories about clothes and tools for survival, Cussy Kauer remembered the old Polette and Boucher stores and their role of selling crafts and supplying crafters with beads and supplies. Howard Farley added that when the Nome Skin Sewers Association dissolved, he bought a bunch of their sewing machines.

"But I don't have them any more," he said.

Addressing the subsection "Environment and seasons," commissioner Charlie Lean remembered gruesome stories of mushers having been found frozen. "At a blowhole near Quartz Creek, they found a musher and his dog team frozen, still standing upright," Lean said. Mulling the question of Nome's uniqueness and why it evolved into a hub city when other communities ceased to exist, Lean offered his view.

"Nome decided to be a community," he said.

Lean argued that different cultures merged and borrowed from each other. "There was the white western culture and it borrowed from the Eskimo culture things like dog mushing. We incorporated that in Nome's culture. That's a big deal and an explanation why Nome is still here."

Dog mushing allowed for mines being built, for mail to be transported from Alaskan main cities to Nome and for sports and entertainment as sled dog racing began right here in Nome.

Howard Farley agreed, saying that those early day miners wanted their mail and as they received it, they remained in the gold rush city. Museum Director Laura Samuelson added that Nome was one of the first three communities nationwide that had mail delivery to homes, including miners' tents.

Commissioner Jake Kenick said he'd like to see more on the Alaska Territorial Guard added in the Military section. Commissioner Kauer said the big fire of 1934 is still missing in the exhibits.

After the work session Kauer said that she was very happy that the writer with PUBLIC organized Nome's history not around a boring chronological timeline but sorted the events by themes. "I was surprised and pleased with how they developed those ideas. They got everything there, chronological," Kauer said.

The work session lasted four

Another session was scheduled to further narrow stories, nuggets and captions for photographs or maps on Tuesday, Sept. 9.

While the commission decides on the schematic design and content of the exhibits, site preparation is nearly finished, said Josie Bahnke

The Arctic Slope Regional Corporation's construction firm ASKW was chosen as the general contractor.

The architects ECI/Hyer hired PUBLIC, a firm specializing in museum exhibits.

Bahnke said that the museum might have to close between September and December to focus staff work on organizing exhibits.

infrastructure is cause for anxiety in at-risk communities.

During a recent Senate Indian Affairs Committee hearing titled "When Catastrophe Strikes: Responses to Natural Disasters in Indian Country," Kawerak Inc. Executive Vice President Mary David of Nome said that the region's environment pointed this out. She testified that the region is changing at an unprecendented rate. She also talked about the increasing severity and frequency of super storms in the region, the rapid erosion of shorelines, and the impact on subsistence

The hearing focused on implementation of new Stafford Act authorities regarding American Indian and Alaska Native tribes' ability to directly request and obtain assistance in responding to natural disasters.

Mary David requested swifter responses after disaster struck. "There is a lack of understanding by federal agencies and personnel regarding the unique living situation of remote Alaska and the challenges rural residents experience on a daily basis," David said.

This is exacerbated by the lack of planning for the next disaster. "Our federal, state, local and tribal governments are ill-prepared for both the natural disasters that we have already experienced and the potential future natural and man-made disasters in our region," David said. "Not only is there a lack of a lead agency spearheading comprehensive efforts to prevent, mitigate and respond to disasters, there is a lack of coordination among the agencies that are tasked with carrying out the splintered component of these efforts."

In 2008, the State's Immediate Action Work Group identified Shaktoolik, Shishmaref and Unalakleet as imminently threatened communities. The Government Accountability Office in 2009 added Golovin, St. Michael and Teller to the list. The report said that Shaktoolik "likely needs to move all at once and as soon as possible.'

Instead of waiting for state or federal governments to respond with a coherent climate change adaptation strategy, the communities of Elim, Koyuk, Shaktoolik and Unalakleet took it into their own hands to act.

Shaktoolik, for example, decided to stay and defend. Shaktoolik Mayor Eugene Asicksick said that back-to-back storms last fall took out 12 to 18 feet of shoreline. "The erosion is just unbelievable," he said. The storm took out parts of the community's water and sewer system. The state paid $10,000, but it took $15,000 to get it fixed. "Funding is always a problem," Asicksick said. After several meetings last winter with the Army Corps of Engineers and the state. Asicksick said, the community just started on their own to construct a berm alongside the beach to fortify the shoreline. The berm is about four feet high and is designed after a vegetated berm around the tank farm had proven ef-

Harvey Smith, P.E. and Ruth Carter are the Coastal and Harbor Engineering Section within the Department of Transportation. "Several years ago, Harvey Smith and I traveled to Shaktoolik to look at an issue on the state runway," Carter wrote to the Nugget. "While there Eugene Asicksik, Fred Sagoonick and Harvey Asicksik showed us a berm they constructed out of woody debris and beach sand, gravel and cobbles in front of their tank farm. It was performing well; mimicking the natural beach and dunes. Since that time it has fully vegetated."

This gave rise to the idea that it may be a viable solution to keep the worst of the storms at bay. "We found that the current village site may be subject to periodic erosion, however indications are that it is in a state of long-term stability with an adequate supply of sediment to keep it healthy," Carter wrote.

'We received two small grants through the Coastal Impact Assistance Program; one to explore the value of a vegetated berm concept and one to develop an inexpensive tool to measure storm surge. Both are designed to encourage local stewardship by providing tools for the communities to help themselves."

Working off this concept, Shaktoolik created a four-foot high berm with materials available: beach gravel and driftwood.

The community agreed to use NSEDC grants worth $620,000 to invest in the berm. It was built with local labor, local equipment and local materials.

The plan

As a response to the lack of planning from government agencies, the Norton Bay Intertribal Watershed Council developed an "adaptation plan as the first step in the long-range goal of addressing the many serious consequences of climate change and other non-climate stressors to the landscape and waters of the Norton Watershed," the document reads. "Through a year-long assessment and planning process, the Council has documented the current and future risks, identified potential opportunities to adapt to climate impacts, and put forth here a plan that outlines specific goals, objectives, and action steps necessary to begin to address these urgent needs for the benefit of the four native villages living in Norton Bay and the surrounding ecosystems on which they depend. In addition, this plan can serve as a model for similar adaptation efforts needed across the Alaskan landscape.' Climate change already has had substantial impacts on Native Alaskan village communities, says the Norton Bay climate adaptation plan. "Increased stream temperatures, altered ice floes, bank erosion, all combine with mining and related development in the Norton Bay watershed to directly threaten the fishery and wildlife habitat upon which the native villages in the area depend on for their subsistence fishing and hunting."

Emily Murray, the project coordinator from Elim said that the plan aims not only to provide a roadmap for Norton Bay communities to fend off adverse climate change symptoms but also to inspire other communities to come up with their own climate change adaptation planning.

Together with Hal Sheperd, the watershed council is building a database by collected data on water temperatures and water levels.

One goal of the plan was to set a precedent in the Norton Sound region for data collection, watershed assessment and climate change adaptation planning. "I am very pleased that with the defeat of House Bill 77 last year, we are now able to keep our data collection and watershed assessment alive," said Murray. HB 77 was pushed by Governor Sean Parnell and aimed to streamline the Dept. of Natural Resources' process for issuing land and water use permits. The Watershed Council and several communities were in opposition of HB 77.

The climate change adaptation plan is meant to be a first step. It identified seven goals, including obtaining funding for emergency preparedness and, if needed, relocation of villages. Goal 2 lists to mitigate or adapt to impact of rising water temperatures and stream bank erosion on aquatic habitat. Goal 3 aims to increase safe access to subsistence resources. Goal 4 is ambitious as it aims to protect subsistence resources in 100 percent of the watershed. Goal 5 is to increase education and outreach for villagers to learn about climate change impacts and adaptation strategies. The last goal seeks to improve the economic conditions of the four villages.

According to Sheperd, the plan was produced with less than $10,000 in funding and lots of volunteer work and elbow grease. "This plan was created with a bottom-of-the-barrel budget," Sheperd told the Nugget.

"Communities realized they cannot do anything about temperatures rising and emissions, but they can come up with plans to limit adverse impacts in their backyards," Sheperd said. One measure would be to leave streams alone and not subject them to more disturbances such as mining. "Some of the rivers here are pristine habitat," said Sheperd.

The entirety of climate change and its ramifications can be paralyzing.

But Murray said a plan marks a good start. "Whether climate change is a natural occurrence or man-made, it's happening. With the plan, we have now goals and can start working at them," Murray said.

IRA President Robert Keith appreciates the work that went into the plan. Keith also laments that there is a lack of government funding for preventative measures.

A concrete examples is that due to beach erosion, local fishermen can no longer pull up their boats in front of Elim. They have to use a 9-mile long road to Moses Point to get to their vessels. But that road is at risk and washes out during fall storms. FEMA funds only allow fixing up infrastructure the way it was, instead of improving the road with the next storm in mind. 'We need more flexibility in our planning," said Keith.

Keith, also chair of the Kawerak Board of Directors, said he would bring the news of the Norton Bay Watershed Council climate change adaptation plan to the next board meeting, scheduled for next week in

One of the ways to bring awareness to the plan's existence was through July's Wild & Scenic film festival held at Nome's Mini Convention Center. The plan also will take center stage at next month's 7th Annual Water Rights Conference in Anchorage.

General Katkus resigns after investigation in Alaska National Guard sexual assault, rape and fraud

Last week, the National Guard Bureau's Office of Complex Investigations issued a report of findings regarding allegations of sexual assault, rape and fraud in the Alaska National

The report found incidents of sexual assault and that Guard members have a lack of trust and confidence in the Alaska National Guard leadership and its ability to handle sexual assault cases. The report also found that favoritism, ethical misconduct and fear of reprisal have eroded trust and confidence in Guard leadership.

It's key findings include that "the AKNG's Sexual Assault Prevention Response Program is well organized but lacks the trust of victims due to an overall lack of confidence in the command," and that the "AKNG leadership has failed to provide the resources, emphasis and oversight in the implementation of the AKNG EEO/EO program."

The report also uncovered fraud. "Examples of fraud included embezzlement of money from a NG family programs account and misuse of government equipment for personal gain," the report reads.

The investigation found that there is a lack of coordination with local law enforcement regarding cases of misconduct committed by members of the AKNG.

Finally, the report found that the "AKNG is not properly administering justice through either the investigation or adjudication of AKNG member misconduct.'

The investigating team gave several recommendations, including improving the management of sexual assaualt matters within the state. "The Team recommends that all levels of command in the AKNG reevaluate their approach to leading soldiers in a positive manner" and "the Team identified nine areas that the AKNG and Alaska legislature may want to consider to improve the administration of justice within the state.

The report concludes that "the lack of confidence relating to both the legal support provided to the command and the lack of trust in the AKNG leadership is impeding the organization from reaching its full potential, and this persistent negative theme is contributing to the perception that the AKNG leadership is not addressing the concerns of sexual assault victims."

In February, Governor Sean Parnell submitted a letter to the Chief of the National Guard Bureau, General Frank J. Grass, asking that the National Guard Bureau's Office of Complex Investigations (NGB-JA/OCI) investigate "open and closed investigations related to reports of sexual assault, rape, and fraud among members of the Alaska National Guard."

The report was released last week. "The dedicated men and women who serve in the Alaska National Guard deserve better and I am committed to restoring the trust they are entitled to," Governor Parnell said. 'While the report's findings are deeply troubling, I know that the overwhelming majority of Alaska National Guard personnel serve admirably and honorably. We will take all necessary steps to ensure respect, responsibility and trust are restored." Governor Parnell requested and received the resignation of Major General Thomas H. Katkus, adjutant general, and commissioner of Alaska Department of Military and Veterans Affairs. Brigadier General Mike Bridges, formerly stationed in Nome with National Guard, now serves as acting commissioner on an interim basis until a new adjutant general is named.

Maj. Gen. Thomas Katkus's resignation was effective Sept. 4.

The governor asked that OCI provide personnel to assist with implethe recommendations menting outlined in the report and wants a further investigation into allegations of fraud regarding the misuse of Guard assets.

U.S. Senator Mark Begich said that the report found more than 200 reports of discrimination and sexual harassment over just the past year and a culture of tolerance of wrongdoing among much of the Guard leadership dating back far longer. "This 229-page report is shocking in its documentation of widespread sexual assault, discrimination, retaliation and tolerance of wrong-doing, especially at the highest levels in the Guard," said Begich. "We've been hearing these reports since 2011 and demanding action by the Parnell administration and senior levels of the National Guard. The vast majority of members of the Alaska National Guard serve our state with distinction and sacrifice, so it's unacceptable that honorable members of the Guard have had to serve for years in a climate of cronyism and retaliation." Begich challenged Governor Parnell to hold "accountable those individuals who have forced the AKNG to operate under a cloud of suspicion and mistrust for so many years."

In a statement, Begich expressed frustration that this is the third investigation of the AKNG on these is-The first investigation, requested by Begich in 2012 based on complaints received in 2011, did not produced significant findings. A second investigation was requested by Senator Lisa Murkowski and produced similar results. Begich maintains the earlier reports did not include significant findings because they were conducted in an ad-hoc manner and often were conducted by the individuals or units accused of

The Alaska Chapter for the National Organization for Women, also criticized Parnell for not ordering the investigation earlier. Alaska NOW states that Parnell received reports of sexual assault and misconduct in the NG in November 2010, but did not act on the reports. "Rather than launch an immediate and official investigation, he merely consulted the very person whom whistle-blowers named as the problem in a culture of mistrust, his friend Mai, Gen. Tom Katkus," said a statement from Alaska NOW.

Senator Bertha Gardner (D-Anchorage) also criticized Parnell for letting the misconduct go on far too long. "The report is worrisome and shows a longstanding disrespect to and mistreatment of members of the Alaska National Guard," said Senator Berta Gardner. She called for independent investigators. "I am very disappointed that the Governor is leaving sexual assault and misconduct investigations in the hands of the Guard's chain of command," said Senator Gardner. "The report shows it is time to protect and defend Alaska National Guard members by using independent civilian investiga-

Alaska Rep. Dan Saddler and Sen. Pete Kelly, co-chairs of the Joint Armed Services Committee, responded after the Governor's press conference in a more forgiving tone, expressing regret that Maj. Gen. Tom Katkus resigned. "As the top civilian authority over the Alaska National Guard, Governor Parnell likewise understands his responsibility to protect the integrity of all elements of the Guard, including the unfortunate necessity of ensuring the most thorough possible response to all actual or alleged incidents of sexual assault, misconduct or fraud," they said.

We regret the loss to public service of Maj. Gen. Tom Katkus, who has given years of service to the Guard, the Department of Military and Veterans Affairs, and the State of Alaska. But we understand the necessity for the Governor to take all necessary steps - and will support him in taking those steps - to ensure a clear path forward so the Alaska National Guard can again enjoy full trust and support both within the ranks, and among the civilian population.'

On 27 August 2014, Governor Parnell requested that the National Guard Bureau conduct a further assessment into the management of federal fiscal resources in the AKNG.

Brig. Gen. Mike Bridges, acting commissioner for the Department of Military and Veterans Affairs and acting adjutant general for the Alaska National Guard, said in a statement that he is working with his team to fully digest the findings of the OCI report.

Kiana teacher arrested on child sex abuse charges from Missouri

By Diana Haecker

On August 29, Owen M. Miller, 43, a teacher in Kiana, was arrested on an outstanding warrant from Savannah, Missouri charging him with the crimes of statutory rape, statutory sodomy, incest and child mo-

The charges stem from alleged crimes that occurred in August 2002, according to the warrant for arrest from the fifth judicial court in Andrew County, Missouri.

The charges are statutory rape in the first degree of a person less than 14 years old; sodomy in the first degree with a person less than 14 years old, incest and two counts of child

Judge Michael Ordnung from Andrew County, Missouri signed a warrant for the arrest of Miller on August 22.

the arrest warrant was listed in custodian. Wasilla.

Judge Ordnung set bail at $250,000.

According to court documents, Trooper Nathan Sheets contacted Andrew County Sheriff Bryan Atkins to confirm that the warrant was outstanding and that the State of Missouri would pursue extradition. Sheets signed a certification stating that Miller has fled from the justice in Missouri and now resides in Alaska. The State of Alaska charged Miller with being a Fugitive from Justice, a felony complaint.

Alaska State Troopers from Kotzebue arrested Miller in Kiana on Friday, August 29.

On August 30, Kotzebue Superior Court Judge Paul Roetman issued a temporary order to set bail for the Fugitive of Justice charge at The defendant's home address on $100,000 in cash and a third party fall.

Miller was transported to Nome and is currently detained at the Anvil Mountain Correctional Center.

Judge Roetman set a hearing for status on extradition for Sept. 10 in

According to the Alaska Dept. of Education database, Miller received his first teaching certificate in Alaska in 2010. His current teaching certificates included English 7 through 12 grades and Spanish K-12.

According to a news report from KNOM, Miller has taught in the Yuniit School District and the Northwest Arctic Borough School District.

KNOM cites Missouri court documents that allege Miller sexually and physically abused his seven adopted children over several years.

The first reports about the abuse came to Missouri prosecutors last

Alaska ranks #1 in rate of women murdered by men

Study released to mark 20th anniversary of the Violence Against Women Act

Washington, DC ranked first in the nation in the rate of women murdered by men, with a rate of 2.57 per 100,000, according to the new Violence Policy Center (VPC) report When Men Murder Women: An Analysis of 2012 Homi-

This year's report applies to 2012, the most recent year for which data is available. The study covers homicides involving one female murder victim and one male offender, and uses data from the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Supplementary Homicide Report.

The annual report is being released during the week marking the 20th anniversary of the Violence Against Women Act (VAWA), which was signed into law on September 13, 1994.

"Since the passage of the Violence Against Women Act 20 years ago, the federal government and many states and communities have taken heroic steps to reduce domestic violence," states VPC Legislative Director Kristen Rand. "Yet today, far more remains to be done to stop the epidemic of violence against women. The rate of women murdered by men in the United States is tragic and unacceptable.'

'We're proud of the six states that have recently passed important bipartisan bills to help keep guns out of the hands of domestic abusers, but we need to do more in the states and on Capitol Hill to address this ongoing tragedy," says Sue Hornik, executive director of States United to Prevent Gun Violence. "The 20th anniversary of the Violence Against Women Act is a fitting time to call

The Violence Policy Center has published When Men Murder Women annually for 17 years. During that period, nationwide the rate of women murdered by men in single victim/single offender incidents has dropped 26 percent — from 1.57 per 100,000 in 1996 to 1.16 per 100,000 in 2012.

However, the rate of women killed by men in the United States remains high. A 2002 study from the Harvard School of Public Health found that the United States accounted for 84 percent of all female firearm homicides among 25 highincome countries, while representing only 32 percent of the female population.

The 10 states with the highest rate of females murdered by males in single victim/single offender incidents in 2012 are Alaska with 2.57 per 100,000; South Carolina (2.06 per 100,000);Oklahoma (2.03 per 100,000); Louisiana, Missisippi, Nevada, Missouri, Arizona, Georgia and Tennessee.

Nationwide, 1,706 females were murdered by males in single victim/single offender incidents in 2012, at a rate of 1.16 per 100,000.

For homicides in which the victim to offender relationship could be identified, 93 percent of female victims nationwide were murdered by a male they knew. Of the victims who knew their offenders, 62 percent were wives, common-law wives, exwives, or girlfriends of the offenders.

Firearms — especially handguns were the weapons most commonly used by males to murder females in 2012. Nationwide, for homicides in which the weapon used could be identified, 52 percent of female victims were shot and killed with a gun. Of the homicides committed with guns, 69 percent were killed with handguns.

The overwhelming majority of these homicides were not related to any other felony crime, such as rape or robbery. Nationwide, for homicides in which the circumstances could be identified, 85 percent of the homicides were not related to the commission of another felony. Most often, females were killed by males in the course of an argument between the victim and the offender.

The District-wide inservice September 2-3 was directed toward the evaluation instrument that will be used for reviewing the performance of our professional staff. This multifaceted tool addresses 41 different instructional elements that are organized into nine design categories. This computer based tool will not only assist administrators in identifying the individual strengths in our teaching staff, but it will also allow the teacher to self evaluate themselves and reflect on their instructional and classroom management techniques. You may hear conversation relevant to the "Marzano Teacher Evaluation Model," hence the author.

We often hear that our education is something that can never be taken away from us. This statement proved itself true again this past week when we contacted 23 former Nome-Beltz graduates and awarded them their High School diplomas. In 2004, the state of Alaska established a requirement that all student graduates needed to pass the Alaska High School Graduation Qualifying Exam before they could be awarded their diplomas. The result of that requirement had a direct impact on many Alaskan High School Graduates. The State Education Department has since realized their errors and no longer requires the HSGQE. This change allowed the School Districts to Award Diplomas to Graduates retroactively. Those 23 students from Nome-Beltz have now finally received the appropriate document acknowledging the Education they have received.

DELIVERING FREIGHT — The Northland Services tug and barge Polar Viking/Pacific Trader sit in the Nome roadstead while awaiting delivery of their goods.

The Dock Walk

Fall is in the air and far away storms have already brought sets of waves rolling onto the shores of Norton Sound. Nome Harbormaster Lucas Stotts reports the following traffic at the Port of Nome and the small boat harbor.

On Sept. 2, Northland Services tug and barge Polar Viking/Pacific Trader arrived to discharge freight. The tankers Themsestern and Diamond Express were still anchored in Nome's roadstead all week.

On Sept. 3, Alaska Logistics tug and barge SeaHawk/Madison Bay arrived to deliver freight.

On Sept. 4, the barges Polar Viking and SeaHawk departed.

There was no traffic on Sept. 5 or

On Sept. 7, the research vessel Aquila arrived to take on crew members before heading north. Researchers on the Aquila are part of the 5-year Arctic Whale Ecology Study, ARCWEST, tagging gray whales. The baseline data gathered is to learn about the occurrence, distribution and habitat use of large whales in the Bering and Chukchi Seas. Northland Services Inc.'s Nunaniq landing craft arrived.

On Sept. 8, Alaska Logistics' tug and barge FishHawk/ Logistics Provider arrived to deliver cargo.

Currently registered at the Nome small boat harbor are 90 gold dredges, 23 support vessels and 23 fishing vessels.

Harbor improvement projects are underway. Crews are removing old pilings and are reinstalling new pilings at the fishing dock.

Norton Sound Salmon Season wrap-up

By Jim Menard, ADF&G

The Norton Sound commercial salmon season closed on September 7.

Preliminary salmon harvest figures this season were: 300 kings, 460 reds, 103,000 chums, 174,000 pinks, and 110,000 silvers.

In the 54-year history of the Norton Sound commercial salmon fishery this year's harvest ranked ninth highest. By species, chum salmon ranked 23rd highest, pink salmon ranked 9th highest and silver salmon ranked 4th highest.

Based on preliminary reports by Norton Sound Seafood Products the department projects a record payment to fishermen of over 1.6 million

In the last four out of five years the ex-vessel value of the Norton Sound salmon fishery has been over $1 million. Although this year was a record, if the ex-vessel value of the fishery from previous years was adjusted for inflation, most of the years from 1974 through 1985 would have a higher ex-vessel value than this year. Previous to 2010 the last time the fishery had reached a million dollar (inflation adjusted) payout to fishermen was in 1994.

Congratulations to the fishermen and the buyer, Norton Sound Seafood Products, on a great season.

Both the North River tower project and Shaktoolik River sonar project were flooded out Labor Day weekend, but the remaining salmon escapement counting projects should be operational until mid-September. Thanks to all the crews for their hard work and dedication this past season.

Unalakleet Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through early September was 77 kings, 185 reds, 32,000 chums, 79,600 pinks and 61,000 silvers. The silver harvest ranks ninth highest.

Shaktoolik Subdistrict

Commercial harvest through early September was 17 kings, 42 reds, 28,900 chums, 35,000 pinks and 19,000 silvers. The silver harvest ranks seventh highest.

Norton Bay Subdistrict

Commercial harvest for the season was 70 kings, 15 reds, 12,000 chums, 26,000 pinks and 9,200 silvers. The silver harvest was a record.

Elim Subdistrict

Commercial harvest for the season was 105 kings, 158 reds, 14,300 chums, 24,200 pinks and 16,400 silvers. The silver harvest was a record.

Cumulative counts through September 5 were 429 kings, 40,000 chums, 326,000 pinks and 14,500 silvers. The silver count only trails the record run of 2006 by 4,500 silvers and there was no commercial fishing in 2006 because of a lack of a market.

Nanook runners travel north and south in search of competition

By Keith Conger Southern Runners: Friday

nanza River.

In general, high school sports do not make distinctions between grade levels during competition. Therefore six Nanooks runners were treated to a rare racing opportunity when they attended the ACS Class Invitational race at Cheney Lake in Anchorage on Friday

The ACS (Anchorage Christian Schools) Class Invitational is unique because it pits freshman and sophomores against each other in the first round of races, and upperclassmen against each other in the second. It also uses a non-traditional race length of 3000 meters (1.86 miles) versus the standard high school cross country running length of 5000 meters (3.1 miles).

Both of the Nanooks' top runners, junior Christine Buffas, and sophomore Wilson Hoogendorn, found themselves in fifth place spots in their respective races. Hoogendorn was also awarded fourth place among all sophomores with his time of 10 minutes, 47 seconds. Buffas' time of 13 minutes, 18 seconds led to her being the second junior to cross the line.

Freshman Harrison Moore joined Hoogendorn and 96 other racers in the freshman/sophomore race. A time of 11:53 helped him crack the top 20, at 17th place. Junior Leif Erikson was the lone Nanooks runner in the upperclassmen's contest. A time of 12:12 earned him a 32nd place finish out of 86 runners.

Buffas was joined in the upperclassmen's girls race by senior Alexis Hutson, whose time of 14:41 guided her into the top 20 in a field of 55. The lone female Nanooks representative in the underclassmen's race was Bianca Trowbridge who took 32nd place out of 57 with a time of 14:37.

Nanooks Head Coach Crystal Tobuk liked that the team got to do an extra race on their travel weekend to Anchorage. She stated, "They usually try to put that race on because they know kids are in town to do the Palmer race (the next day). They try to make the race shorter so that the kids don't get too tired out."

High school cross country races are usually run on trails but, according to Hoogendorn, the Cheney Lake trail had some unusual twists. "We started out on pavement, but then the trail went onto a super sloppy, muddy section, and then finished on pavement. The wooded section was really fun and super fast."

The variable conditions made it hard for the runners to decide which footwear to use. Many high school runners don special, lightweight shoes that allow spikes to be added to the soles - kind of like the runner's equivalent of studded tires.

"I used spikes with blanks," said Hoogendorn, referring to using lightweight shoes but not putting any spikes in, "but everyone else on the team used their regular trainers.'

Southern Runners: Saturday "That's the Big One," said Tobuk when asked about the Palmer Invitational meet. Tobuk said that the logistics for many of the larger meets in Anchorage are presented by Anchorage running specialty store Skinny Raven Sports. "The Palmer meet broke the record for the number of kids Skinny Raven was tracking. They had over 900 runners.

'Our kids like to be able to see how they rate in comparison to other kids around the state," adds Tobuk. "They get to see how much work they need to do to make it to the state

The Nanook runners certainly got some good feedback toward that goal on Saturday when they attended the meet in Palmer. Not only did they get a chance to race against some of the state's best small school runners from the 1A, 2A, 3A division, but also got to race against their conference rivals, the Barrow Whalers.

The comparative results of the top three Nanooks versus the top three Whalers tipped in favor of the Whaler boys. While Hoogendorn's 13th place time of 17:58 helped him to be the first of the bunch to cross the line, Barrow's Pavel Hernandez was only two spots behind with a time of 18:11. The next two northern runners under the arch were Kevin Goodwin and Trevor Thomas, both from Barrow.

Erikson was able to nip his younger teammate, Moore, by four seconds on the Palmer course with a time of 19:37. The pair finished 40th and 41st respectively.

The tables were turned in the head-to-head match-up between the Lady Nanooks and Lady Whalers. Buffas' time of 22:24 helped her to a 17th place overall finish. She was 25 seconds faster than Barrow's top runner, Melissa Nicely. She finished seven places ahead of her rival.

Both Trowbridge, who set a personal record at the race, and Hutson were able to place in front of Barrow's number two and three runners, Alynne Bankston and Rebecca Masterson.

The competitive meeting between two of Division 1 North's top teams sets up interesting match-ups in the regional meet at the end of the month. State qualification criteria at the region level allows for only the top team to qualify. According to Tobuk, the top ten runners in both the girls and boys race also get passes to attend the state meet.

11:30 am: Boys and Girls JV &
Junior High
12:00am: Girls varsity race

12:30pm: Boys varsity race 1:00pm: Open/Community race teams qualify for the high school state meet this year.

Although overall results had yet to be produced at press time, Kotzebue athletic director Paul Bartos reported that the Kotzebue Huskies won both high school races. Harry Baldwin of Kotzebue was first across in the boy's race, and Calia Sieh of Kotzebue was the first girl to finish.

Here are the individual Nanooks' team place results according to Nanooks assistant cross country running coach, Cory Erikson.

Nome's finishers in the high school boys' race were Oliver Hoogendorn, 2nd, James Horner, 6th, Jamie Yi, 10th, John Wade, 12th, Nathaniel Appolloni 15th, Daniel Head, 16th, and Chad Callahan, 18th.

Nome's finishers in the high school girls' race were Mary Fiskeaux, 2nd, Katie Kelso, 11th, Janelle Trowbridge, 14th, Daphne Lya 20th Nome's finishers in the junior school boys' race were Ben Cross, 4th, Devin Otton, 7th, and Brayden Bahnke, 10th.

Nome's finishers in the junior high school girls' race were Ava Earthman, 2nd, Starr Erikson, 4th, Mallory Conger, 14th, and Daynon Medlin,18th.

According to Erikson, the weather for the meet was a near perfect 50 degrees, with little wind. The course differed from last year's course by being "about 1/3 being asphalt," said Erikson. The hills of the past were taken out, presenting a much flatter, and faster, course.

Bartos says the race was well attended with an estimated total of 250 runners from kindergarten to high school. The meet had runners from Kotzebue, Nome, Kiana, Shungnak, Noatak, Kivalina, Kobuk, Selawik, Noorvik, Buckland, Deering, and Ambler.

Waylon Zachary Okpealuk was born April 23, 1996-Died August 13. Waylon was born to Sally and Allan Okpealuk on April 23, 1996 at NSHC. Waylon unexpectedly left us August 13, 2014. Waylon was a happy, handsome baby growing up. He was not mischievous until his teenage years. Waylon always had a handsome bright smile that made everybody feel better.

When Waylon became a teenager he was eager to go hunting/fishing. Wesley and Waylon would walk to Pitaruk to hunt ptarmigans. When Waylon caught anything his parents would pluck them, but his dad would gut, cook and eat them with Rickie and Waylon. He was always smelting with Wesley, dog teaming and hunting and just going places together.

This summer he helped his dad set net so that we can have fish for the winter. Without him we wouldn't have any fish. He was learning to cut and clean them and his dad was teaching him the types of salmon. His mom and dad were so happy he set net for them. His dad would tell him, "We're catching fish", even if the net was just half ways out.

He was preparing to leave for UAA and major in Mechanical Engineering. He told his dad he would go to college and make his mom and dad proud. He would go visit his papa Winfred Sr. and sit with him to keep him company. He was his favorite tudik. When Waylon would leave his papa's he would kiss him on the cheek and tell him "I love you papa" He was mama's pride and joy and daddy's good little boy who never caused any problems for anybody. He worked during the summer for City of Brevig as the alternate facility man. His co-workers enjoyed working with him. When he left for work he would say "bye mom" or "bye dad" and always "I love you" followed.

Waylon loved to babysit for Mary and Pum to make himself extra money. Sometimes though he made excuses.

He is survived by his parents: Sally and Allan, sisters: Andrea and Anna, brothers: Kevin and Rickie, half brothers and sister: Allen Roy, Clark and Stacy. His papa's Windred Olanna Sr. and James Okpealuk, too many aunties, uncles and cousins to mention. His nieces, Layla and Puneeruk and Johanna Adams and his nephew Elijah. #### Opinion: Legalized Marijuana Will Not Stop Drug Cartels

Alaskan Association of Chiefs of Police urges Alaskans to vote no on ballot measure 2

Recent reports from Colorado law enforcement indicate that the legalization of marijuana has not reduced illicit sales on the black market there as proponents had predicted. In particular, black market dealers continue to sell to youth, and Lieutenant Mark Comte of the Colorado Springs Police Department vice and narcotics unit reported to the Associated Press that marijuana legalization has "done nothing more than enhance the opportunity for the black market" (http://bigstory.ap.org/article/legal-pot-colorado-hasnt-stopped-black-market). The Alaska Association of Chiefs of Police (AACOP) is concerned that Alaskans are being misled about the potential impacts legalized marijuana would have on law enforcement, public safety and the street market in Alaska.

"Proponents have argued that legalizing marijuana will take profits away from the black market and put that money into the pockets of the state, but we anticipate that street sales will continue to thrive," said Kalie Klaysmat, executive director of the Alaskan Association of Chiefs of Police, "In fact, in many ways, legalization would help street dealers do their business because by avoiding the taxes imposed on legal sales they could increase their profit while still undercutting legitimate prices."

An annual RAND report from 2012 showed that Mexican drug trafficking groups only received a minority of their revenue from marijuana ( http://www.rand.org/pubs/occasional_papers/OP325.html ). For them, the big money is found in illegal activities such as human trafficking, extortion, piracy and other illicit drugs. Legalizing marijuana will not make these groups disappear. There is evidence that cartels are already heavily involved in some legal retail marijuana shops in Colorado, continuing to profit off the substance. An August 2014 report (linked below) prepared by the Rocky Mountain High-Intensity Drug Trafficking Areas program lists several examples of current, large scale organized crime and cartel activities linked to Colorado marijuana production and sales. HIDTA is part of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy.

Crime associated with the black market continues to be a problem in Colorado. According to reports from District Attorney George Brachler to the

Saying It Sincerely

By Rev. Ross Tozzi, St. Joseph Catholic Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association A Generous God

At a prison in the lower 48, a man had just been executed for the crime of murder. One pro-life demonstrator called out that the murderer could be forgiven by God if he was truly repentant and then he added insult to injury by explaining that all who seek God's mercy may go to heaven. A family member who wanted an eye for an eye, a life for a life shouted back, "If that murderer goes to heaven, I'd rather go to hell." Is this fair, is this just?

Our sense of justice demands fairness, but God's sense of justice is marked by generosity and we are not comfortable with this. And to add insult to injury, God asks us to adopt his sense of generosity as our own. What are the implications?

God has richly blessed the state of Alaska with many natural resources, including the North Slope whose revenues provide the money to run our state, to fund the Permanent Fund Dividend and to give every one a fuel dividend to defray the cost of heating their homes this winter. Will much of that money be spent unwisely? Undoubtedly, one women called me in tears when she saw how people were so foolishly spending their money for alcohol and drugs. Another made the observation that the stores are selling an awful lot of High Definition TVs that won't heat homes . . . We know that winter is coming soon, that fuel prices are still much higher than they were last year and that those who do not prudently plan for the winter will suffer great difficulties throughout the winter. This is foolishness not generosity? A generous God calls to provide for the true needs of our families and to share that generosity with others not so fortunate. And we are called to be generous stewards not only with our material wealth, but also with our time and talents.

God offers us something infinitely more valuable than a dividend check. He offers us mercy and forgiveness. A generous response to God's mercy is to forgive others who have trespassed against us. A foolish response is to hold on to grudges. When we selfishly force others to do things our way, are we being generous? When we demand retribution, when we will not rest unless we hurt and punish others, are we being generous? Rather, let us follow the generous example of Jesus, "Father forgive, them, they know not what they do."

When times are good, it is easy to be generous, but what about in times of struggle and difficulty? This is when Jesus is most generous. There was a crowd of 5,000. The apostles could only find two loaves and five fish among the crowd. They begged Jesus to send the crowd away. But a generous Jesus blessed the food and provided for all to eat. How can you follow Jesus' example of generosity?

Jesus was being crucified on the cross. He was in great pain not only physically but spiritually and emotionally as well. In his generosity, he still spoke to those around him. One criminal mocked him but the other came to his defense. But the other thief was like the worker who showed up at the end of the day, but received a full days wage. The generous response of Jesus was merciful, "Today you will be with me in paradise." When we are tired, and suffering, when we are persecuted and crucified, do we curse God or do we in some way seek to be generous like Jesus?

Perhaps it is a mixture of common sense and pragmatism to say, I could never do that. Let me rest, let me be alone, leave me to suffer in my own misery. In his generosity, God will help you to carry your cross if you let him in. In his generosity, God can give you the strength to rise from the valley of despair, if you allow him.

"Seek the Lord while he may be found, call to him while he is near.

Lt.Gov kicks off initiative hearings on marijuana in Nome

By Diana Haecker

Last Tuesday, Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell held the first of eight statewide hearings on Ballot Measure 2, an initiative to legalize marijuana in the state.

The initiative, if passed, would create an "Act to tax and regulate the production, sale and use of marijuana." If the measure succeeds, Alaska could become the third U.S. state to legalize recreational pot use.

Voters in Colorado and Washington passed a similar measure in

If passed, the initiative would make use of marijuana legal for persons over 21 years of age, allowing them to possess, use, display, purchase or transport up to one ounce of marijuana. It would impose some restrictions on personal cultivation, public use and the operation of marijuana related facilities.

Under the measure, the state Legislature could create a Marijuana Control Board under the Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development. It proposes to levy a $50 per ounce excise tax on the sale or transfer of marijuana from a cultivation facility to a retail store or marijuana product manufacturing facility. The producer would pay the tax.

Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell said that there would be seven more hearings held in Barrow, Juneau, Ketchikan, Anchorage, Wasilla, Bethel and Fairbanks.

He explained that several state departments were asked to submit their cost estimates associated with the bill. The Dept. of Revenue estimated that it would need to create three more positions to oversee the new excise tax, at an annual cost of $300,000

The Department also estimates a

This year's Municipal election will offer the voters slim pickings as all candidates running for Nome Common Council, Utility Board and School Board are unopposed.

On Monday, Sept. 15, the filing period for people interested in running for office ended and produced the following names:

Running for seat 'A' of the Common Council is incumbent Tom Sparks. The term is for three years.

Seat 'B', also a three-year term, is occupied by Louis Green Sr., who is also the sole candidate to run for that Utility Board seat B, a two-year term is held by Fred Moody, who submitted his name again for election. Moody runs unopposed.

Carl Emmons is the incumbent for Utility Board seat E, a three-year term. Emmons has filed for election and also runs unopposed.

School Board seat 'A' is occupied by Jennifer Reader. She runs unopposed. School Board seat 'B' incumbent

Barb Nickels decided not to run for re-election. Brandy Arrington de-

Oil suspected on two harvested seals near Gambell

By Diana Haecker

Laboratories have yet to confirm that two spotted seals harvested near Gambell on St. Lawrence Island last week had swum through an oil slick, but the hunters are pretty sure it was oil on the seals' coats.

The two animals were harvested on September 6 and 12 off the beach near Gambell.

Gambell IRA president Eddy Ungott phoned UAF Marine Advisory Program Agent Gay Sheffield and reported that there was oil on the seals.

Leon Antoghame harvested the second spotted seal on Sept. 12 near Gambell. He didn't see anything unusual about the seal until he brought the animal ashore and noticed a dark colored spot on the young seal's back and side. "It had a bald spot on its head and was yellow at the belly," Antoghame described.

Antoghame took tissue samples from the internal organs, blubber, flipper and jaws. He said the substance on the seal's coat looked and

"It hurts to see our food spoiled like that," said Antoghame

Since the seal was not fit for consumption, the carcass was discarded.

"Anytime we have oiled wildlife it is a serious concern," said Gay Sheffield, UAF's Marine Advisory Program Agent in Nome.

This is our third oiling event in three years. We still don't know the source," she said.

The hunters notified Sheffield, who set into motion alerts to a multitude of agencies, including the U.S. Coast Guard, Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation, NMFS Office of Response and Restoration, NMFS Office of Protected Re-

Letters -

Dear Editor:

Now that the election is over, the oil companies change their mind and decide not to increase oil production. Kudos to Captain Zero for not asking the oil companies to give back the state's money. The dividend checks were set up to help Alaskans pay their bills. Captain Zero knows that the millionaires and billionaires of the lower 48 who own oil stocks in the oil companies here that are getting the states free billions of dollars have bills to pay as well. The rich and powerful need the state's billions of dollars more than we do. Like Captain Zero says, there is nothing more important in the world than the state helping the wealthy get wealthier. My motto is "Captain Zero for Gover-He is not the governor who can do more for Alaska, but the governor who can do less. What more could we ask for in a governor? John Suter

Chugiak, AK 99567 Dear Editor:

I'm writing this letter because I am concerned for the future of our subsistence rights as Native peoples in Alaska. This coming election we have an important selection for US Senator. Mark Begich is clear on supporting subsistence rights, and while I was listening to Dan Sullivan on KOTZ radio earlier this month he said he was "strongly supportive" of subsistence rights and is "very focused on making sure we maintain" those rights. I completely agree with this statement, but his official actions were opposing when working in the Parnell administration. Sullivan challenged subsistence rights by appealing the Katie John case despite petitions from the Alaska Federation of Natives (AFN) and tribes.

When he was Attorney General (AG) for the State of Alaska, Sullivan sued Katie John as AG, sending the 9th circuit decision to the Supreme Court for an appeal. AFN considered this an assault upon the people of Alaska who depend upon hunting, fishing and gathering to feed their families. If Sullivan had his way, Katie John would have lost that case, threatening every Alaska Native's right to hunt and fish on our own land.

Let's make sure we are informed

Not a Person

The U.S. Supreme Court sold its soul to the devil when it ruled that corporations are persons. A person has a heart and a soul. The only thing a corporation has is a big bank account.

The court has pandered to the rich outside interests who can spend unlimited funds on advertising to buy our votes. In some ads the boogie man stretches the facts beyond the limits, then up pops the devil denouncing Harry Reid and President Obama. Oh, give us a break. Groups like Citizens United and their ilk are not persons and to consider these bloated organizations as persons is a threat to our democracy. We have big oil which spent $18 million to narrowly defeat the oil tax reform bill. We had Mr. Big Eyes sanctimoniously doing the jobs mantra. Not one month later BP announced a 17 percent reduction in its work force.

The Supreme Court needs to rethink its ruling that gives corporations the status of individuals. The Supreme Court has opened the doors to the concept that elected offices can be bought. -N.L.M.-

Nome Superior Court has new magistrate judge

By Diana Haecker

Longtime Nomeite and wellknown attorney Bob Lewis, 61, was chosen to fill the vacancy left by Magistrate Brooke Alowa, who last month accepted the position as the chief of enforcement for the Alaska State Commission on Human Rights in Anchorage.

Lewis began working at the Nome Court on September 8.

Second Judicial District Presiding Judge Michael Jeffery hired Bob Lewis out of an applicant pool of 15

Bob Lewis is currently "Magistrate in Training" as he embarks on a new career as Magistrate Judge. Since 1977 he has worked as a private practice lawyer, Public Defender and attorney for the Alaska Legal Services office.

Lewis — born in Anchorage returned to Alaska as a young lawyer in 1977 after graduating from Hastings College of Law in San Francisco. He was hired to work at the Alaska Legal Services office in Nome. Then he went into private practice for two years in Nome before moving to Anchorage in 1980. For a short time, Lewis worked in Anchorage for the Public Defender's office and then went into private practice. Lewis returned to Nome in 1999 and joined the law office of Conner Thomas, Brian Timbers and Jon Larson. As Timbers and Larson retired, the successor law firm was named Thomas & Lewis.

Bob Lewis went into "semi-retirement" in 2012. Once the Magistrate position became open last month, he became intrigued with the possibility of gaining insight into a new aspect of the law. "It seemed like a good opportunity to see things from a different perspective," Lewis said in a recent interview with The Nome Nugget. "It is an interesting challenge." When the position became open, an acquaintance asked Lewis if he had applied, and he answered 'no.

"Then I tried to come up with a good reason why not to apply, Lewis said. Apparently he couldn't and so he applied and rose to the top of the applicant's list.

As Lewis settles in to see the law from a Magistrate's perspective, he finds that there are more things to consider than just the opposing parties to a case.

"It's quite interesting to learn the precise processes," said Lewis. He explained that lawyers usually try to assess things in a case the way a judge would. "They have to consider both sides, so that is not remarkably different. But what I find remarkable is that you have to consider all the agencies that are involved and go along with it," he said. "This expands my world view beyond the

Strait Action

BP to cut jobs in Alaska

BP announced that it would cut around 275 staff and contractor jobs in Alaska in early 2015.

BP sold its interests in four oil fields in the North Slope area to the privately held company Hilcorp earlier this year. The sale agreement includes all of BP's interests in the Endicott and Northstar oilfields and a 50 percent interest in each of the Liberty and the Milne Point fields.

The sale also includes BP's interests in the oil and gas pipelines associated with these fields.

According to BP's website, the company employs 2,300 employees and more than 6,000 contractor jobs

BP said it would continue expanding its interest in Prudhoe Bay, bringing in two additional drill rigs. It also considers production of liquefied natural gas from reserves in Alaska.

A press release announcing the sale of the four oilfield interests to a Hilcorp said, "Approximately 250 employees are associated with the assets included in the agreement and the company is committed to providing clarity about their future as soon as possible. The majority of those BP employees at or supporting Milne Point, Endicott and Northstar are expected to be offered positions with Hilcorp with no break in employ-

This apparently changed.

Even Governor Sean Parnell was not pleased with BP's announcement. "I'm extremely disappointed in this action. No one likes to see jobs reduced, and I am especially concerned about the disruption for families who work in the energy sector," Parnell said in a statement.

BP was among the contributors to push the "Vote No on One" campaign, fighting against a voter referendum to repeal the controversial oil tax law SB 21.

BP is also under pressure as the size of the amount of the fine the company faces over the 2010 Gulf of Mexico oil spill is uncertain as well as over the impact of Western sanctions on its operations in Russia.

August warmest on record

Climate Central reports that this

August was the warmest August on record globally. According to newly released NASA temperature data, Central Europe, northern Africa, parts of South America, and the western portions of North America including Alaska saw much higher than normal temperatures for the month. Large parts of the oceans were also running unusually warm.

August temperatures were 1.3°F higher than the 1951-1980 average for the month according to NASA

The record-setting August capped off what NASA data shows was the fourth warmest summer on record globally, coming in 1.12°F above average. That puts it in a tie with the summer of 2005, but behind 2011, 2009 and 1998 by NASA's rankings.

EPA announces new actions to curb greenhouse gases

This week, Environmental Protection Agency Administrator Gina Mc-Carthy and private and public sector leaders at the White House announced new steps to curb emissions of hydrofluorocarbons, potent greenhouse gases used in refrigeration and air conditioning. Administrator Mc-Carthy announced additional EPA actions to reduce HFC emissions and encouraged private sector investment in HFC-free technology.

'The good progress we are making on restoring the earth's ozone layer would not have been possible without a strong public-private sector partnership," said EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy. "I know by working together again we can tackle the challenges of climate change and meet the President's goal to curb emissions of the most potent greenhouse gases.'

EPA announced three new actions that will help support a smooth transition to climate-friendly alternatives to HFCs, including: listing additional fluorinated and non-fluorinated chemicals as acceptable alternatives in a variety of industry applications; identifying refrigerant management options to reduce HFC emissions from air conditioning and refrigeration equipment; and organizing with stakeholder engagement a series of sector-specific workshops on seeking transitions away from high global warming potential HFCs.

The new efforts build upon progress and commitments already made under EPA's Green Chill partnership, which works with the supermarket industry to transition to climate-friendly refrigerants, reduce the amount of refrigerant used and eliminate harmful refrigerant leaks. nationwide supermarkets reduce refrigerant leaks to the current GreenChill Partner average of 12.4 percent, they could generate annual cost savings of over $100 million across the industry while preventing the annual emission of about 27 million metric tons of carbon dioxide equivalent, which is equal to emissions from the generation of electricity use by more than 3.7 million homes annually.

Rosneft/ExxonMobil and Moscow State University scientists to develop oil-degrading arctic bacteria

The online publication Oil and Gas Technology reports that Rosneft and ExxonMobil's joint arctic technology research arm, the Arctic Research and Design Centre, has signed a contract to collaborate on research work with the Lomonosov Moscow State University.

They aim to research and develop microbial biotechnology capable of performing oils-spill and water contamination clean-up in Arctic regions, focussing on psychrophilic bacteria that survive and thrive in low temperatures.

LMSU specialists will conduct the research and analysis of at least five methods of generating these microbes and will elaborate techniques of the bacteria usage. The research will include taking samples from oilcontaminated areas to extract psychrophilic organisms from natural microbial populations, development of a step-by-step method to detect and isolate the oil-degrading microorganisms tolerant to arctic temperature and salinity conditions while also being efficient degraders for a number of ecologically hazardous toxicants including hydrocarbons of oil and oil products and polynuclear aromatic hydrocarbons resistant to oxidation.

The laboratory specimen of the biological product will be tested in a flow-through sea aquarium using temperature and salinity conditions consistent with arctic environments.

Healy completes Arctic science deployment

The Coast Guard reported that after completing 130 days of operations in the Bering Sea, Chukchi Sea and Arctic Ocean, the Coast Guard Cutter Healy was back in Seattle last

During the last four months, Healy conducted three missions to further scientific knowledge and understanding of the Arctic.

The first mission, the Study of Under Ice Blooms in the Chukchi Ecosystem, was led by Stanford University personnel with funding from the National Science Foundation. Scientists worked with a conductivity, temperature and depth rosette, plankton and zooplankton nets, vanveen grabs, a light-frame onsite keyspecies investigative imaging device, a trace metal detection FISH that was towed alongside the ship, a trace metal pump and weather balloons. The compilation of each of these individual components enabled a vast amount of scientific data about the Chukchi ecosystem to be woven together for education and understanding of ongoing biological, physical and chemical oceanographic and other related trends in the Arctic.

Throughout this phase Healy's crew completed 230 science station evolutions in which the ship stopped to conduct operations, including 14 onice deployments.

The second scientific mission of the summer was completed by Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution scientists who were studying the Pacific Boundary Current and other oceanographic trends in the Arctic. The study of these currents and data collection was captured utilizing sub-surface oceanographic moorings. The moorings remain onsite for one to two years and capture a yearlong dataset of what is occurring on the continental shelf off the north coast of Alaska. The information collected by the moorings, along with data captured by 156 CTD rosette casts, allow for the continuation of research that has been supported by Healy over the last 10 years.

The third and final science pursuit of the summer was accomplished with a team from the Coast Guard's Research and Development Center. Members from the center brought technologies and equipment to be utilized for oil spill monitoring in the harsh Arctic environment. Tools used to complete mission objectives and testing evaluation consisted of several remotely operated vehicles, a few small unmanned aerial systems, an autonomous underwater vehicle.

• Marijuana initiative

The Dept. of Commerce, Community and Economic Development pegged the cost of the creation of a Task Force to identify legal, policy and procedural issues at nearly $1.6 million for the first year, about $1.4 million for the second year.

The Dept. of Health and Social Services came up with a wide-ranging cost estimate between $0 and 2.9 million. The Dept. of Public Safety estimates a cost of $1.4 million to respond to new realities of dealing with drivers under the influence of pot, having more drug enforcement troopers trained as drug recognition experts, increasing the number of statewide drug unit trooper investigators and launching public awareness campaigns on the dangers of driving under the influence of marijuana.

Also, troopers expect more blood samples sent for toxicology tests to detect the presence of marijuana in the blood.

The Dept. of Environmental Conservation regulates foods and estimates a cost of $0 to nearly $140,000 for its efforts to establish the regulation of marijuana food products.

Before public testimony, the initiative's proponents and opponents had ten minutes each to present their arguments.

Dr. Tim Hinterberger, the chair of the group "Campaign to regulate marijuana in Alaska", which proposed and sponsored the initiative, testified in favor of the bill. Hinterberger said the main goal behind the measure was not to generate tax for the state. "The goal was to get marijuana out of the hands of the black market and see to it that it is properly regulated and sold by legitimate businesses," Hinterberger said.

He argued that the initiative is a grassroots movement made up of hundreds of volunteers and experts who have been involved with this issue for many years. "Alaskans from Anchorage to Nome and everywhere in between have recognized that marijuana prohibition has failed," he stated.

The bill, he argued, would create a sensible approach to regulating as about 100,000 Alaskans are using marijuana.

"It's not a question if marijuana should be in the state but how the existing industry should be managed," Hinterberger said. He stressed that if the measure passes, it still would give local governments the option to ban the purchase or sale of marijuana.

"It could be no different from today where individual possession is allowed."

Hinterberger argued that marijuana is safer than alcohol. Hinterberger pointed to data from Colorado, claiming that teen use has decreased in Colorado, which passed a similar measure in 2012. "Counter to what you'll hear from the opposing side, it will be harder for teens to access marijuana," Hinterberger said, "By regulating it, sales will be conducted by responsible businesses, with proof of identification and no incentives to sell to minors."

Hinterberger summarized the pro's saying that legalizing could lead to decreases in alcohol consumption; that it will protect teens, that it will create more jobs for Alaskans and ensure safe access to marijuana.

Prohibition, he said, is a waste of precious law enforcement time and forces those who can legally access medical marijuana to purchase it from the black market. He said when marijuana was made illegal in 1937, it was done due to ignorance and racism.

Kristina Woolston spoke for the opposition group "Big Marijuana. Big Mistake. Vote No on 2".

She said the Alaska Chamber of Commerce, the Alaska Association of Chiefs of Police and other opponents of the measure believe that it will cost the state, not contribute to more revenue.

She pointed to the fine print of the initiative and argued that even after going through the fine-tuning in the rule making process, the Colorado task force was not able to disallow edibles from the sale of marijuana products. Thus, cookies and other products appealing to kids and teens would be a danger. The industry is finding many creative ways to package marijuana edibles to teens and young people. Woolston argued that one in six adolescents who use marijuana will become addicted and their IQ will drop up to eight points if they are using during the formative teen years.

The Big Marijuana. Big Mistake campaign argues legalization of marijuana would lead to commercialization that would change Alaska's social norms; that the initiative could would cost the state, not increase state revenue and that it would have severe health effects on the users. The campaign argues that the comparison with alcohol is not a valid one. "For a state that already struggles with substance abuse, why add another legal drug to the mix," the group argues.

Only three people testified at the hearing in person. Tim Smith spoke out in favor of the initiative. "This is about freedom," he said. "Marijuana prohibition is not more effective now then alcohol prohibition was in the 1930s," Smith said. He saw the suffering of his sister-in-law when she was battling stomach cancer, and even though medical marijuana was theoretically a way to ease the pain, she was not able to get it.

Frosty Hughes raised the point why other useful parts of the plant are excluded from the bill. Don Handeland, a student at Oregon State University, spoke out against the initiative, asking the question who drafted the bill and voicing his preference to leave it up to elected state Legislators to create a bill.

Nome Police Chief John Papa-

sodora said in an interview with the Nome Nugget that he believes it would have detrimental effects for Nome if the initiative passes. "It will significantly increase the use of marijuana, no doubt, it will increase calls for service for the police, fire and ambulance services," Papasodora said. "Yes, the state will make some money, but the costs will exceed the revenue."

He said legalization would mean that folks could mix two legal drugs: alcohol and marijuana. "The net effect will not be good," Papasodora said. The police chief argued that currently 87 to 97 percent of all calls for service to the Nome Police Department are alcohol related. Calls would only rise, stretching resources even thinner. "Social services, health care, public service officers, the whole system will be stretched," Chief Papasodora speculated.

On November 4, voters in Alaska will decide on three initiatives, including measure 2. Other initiatives are ballot measure 3, an Act to raise the state's minimum wage, and ballot measure 4, an Act Providing for Protection of Bristol Bay Wild Salmon and Waters Within or Flowing Into the Existing 1972 Bristol Bay Fisheries Reserve.

Oiled seals

NMFS Office of Protected Resources, Kawerak Subsistence Program and the Eskimo Walrus Commission. The lead federal agency that responds to oil pollution in the ocean is the U.S. Coast Guard, Sector Anchorage.

The Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation leads the State's response.

Samples from both seals were sent to a U.S. Coast Guard laboratory to determine a possible source. More samples were sent to DEC to confirm the substance is oil-based.

Tissues samples were also sent to the North Slope Borough's Division of Wildlife Management to determine the health of the seals and the levels of pollution in their bodies.

This marks the third year in a row that oiled wildlife was found around St. Lawrence Island in the fall time. No other region in Alaska — not the North Slope Borough, Yukon-Kuskokwim region, or the Aleutians — have reported oiled wildlife in the past three years.

"It seems to be only affecting the St. Lawrence Island, Bering Strait area," said Kawerak Subsistence Director Brandon Ahmasuk.

"This is a big concern for all subsistence users," added Ahmasuk. He also said he would like to see a more vigorous response from the government to search for the source of the oil that seems to leak into the waters around Saint Lawrence Island. An often-voiced concern is that there could be an unreported leaking boat - possibly on the nearby Russian side of the International Dateline. However, a Coast Guard spokesman could not confirm if they have information about a potential leaking vessel on the other side of the border.

"This is a very serious issue for us," said Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation on-scene coordinator Ashley Adamczak. The first step Adamczak said, is to run analytical tests to see if the seals were indeed soiled with a refined petroleum product. If it is determined that it is oil, the next steps are to identify the type of petroleum product and to find its source.

In 2012, three seals (two off Gambell and one in Shishmaref) and several migratory birds (murres, crested auklet, kittiwake) were found covered with an oily substance.

Coast Guard spokesman Shawn Eggert said the US Coast Guard's lab results in 2012 were inconclusive as to whether or not the seals were

However, a scientific poster authored by UAF MAP, Eskimo Walrus Commission, North Slope Borough Dept. of Wildlife Management, Northwest Fisheries Science Center, Alaska Veterinary Pathology Services, Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game, and the NMFS Office of protected Resources states "this marked the first documentation of oil fouling Alaskan ringed and spotted seals."

The poster also reads that "Prevention, assessment and clean-up of hazardous material spills - as it relates to Bering Strait marine wildlife cannot be viewed solely as a wildlife conservation concern. Investigations of contaminated marine wildlife must consider analytical methodology, research strategies, and management issues – in terms of regional public health/safety and food security concerns.'

No source of the oil was located in 2012.

In December 2013, Gambell hunters detected two oil-covered glaucous gulls. One gull was sent to Nome and it was confirmed it had oil

At that time the DEC began an investigation and the U.S. Coast Guard conducted a C-130 reconnaissance flight from Kodiak to Saint Lawrence Island to look for the source of the oil.

Again, no oil slick was seen.

Just as in the previous two years, last week's reports of oiled seals leave responders and the region's residents wondering about the source and location of the oil slick that the seals likely swam through.

Coast Guard Sector Anchorage spokesman Shawn Eggert said the Coast Guard received the tissue samples, will split them with ADEC.

Then analyses will begin in both the State and Federal labs.

At this point, Eggert said, there are no overflights of the area

As of Friday, Sept. 12, there were no oil sheens reported, he said.

"It is very challenging to deal with that without having found the source," said Adamczak. "We hope this is an isolated incident but now that this occurs for the third year in a row, it is at the top of our list to identify the source," she said.

Other tissues samples were sent to the North Slope Borough's Dept. of Wildlife Management histopathological analysis to determine the health of the seals as well as the levels of oil pollution in the inner organs and blubber.

MAP Agent Gay Sheffield said that communities with active subsistence practices of marine wildlife are the most experienced to see and know about an unusual event- and they have the highest immediate concerns.

She said, in past incidents, it has been proven that regional teamwork, good communications, and a dose of patience on everyone's part were the best ingredients to finding out what has happened.

She also reminded people to immediately report oiled wildlife or unusual marine debris.

"If someone does see oiled wildlife and is able to get the animal to Nome, we will get it to the USCG to trace it to the source of the oil.

Additionally, it will be thoroughly examined to learn about the levels of pollution in this important food resource," said Sheffield.

Agencies to contact in case of finding more oiled wildlife are:

SPENDING AN EXTRA DAY IN NOME—Due to high winds and choppy seas, the barge Madison Rose didn't leave Nome until Sept. 13.

The Dock Walk

Fall is in the air as Nomeites could tell by stormy weather that brought some good-sized rollers onto Norton Sound. Choppy seas kept gold dredges anchored at Belmont Point for the better part of the week.

Other ship traffic was also held over in Nome due to weather. With Harbormaster Lucas Stotts on leave this week, Project Manager for Port Expansion and Development Joy Baker reports last week's harbor and port activity:

On Tuesday, Sept. 9, the tug and barge Fishhawk/Logistics Provider completed their cargo operations and departed in the afternoon. The landing craft Devon departed late evening, carrying construction equipment for a coastal project. Tanker vessels Themsestern and Diamond Express anchored in Nome's roadstead to load lighter vessels as needed. The Diamond Express left before the weekend.

On Sept. 10, the tug and barge Arctic Bear/Alaska Provider arrived to discharge contaminated soil from an ongoing cleanup of a formerly used military site at St. Lawrence Island. The tug and barge remained in Nome to wait for better weather conditions before returning to SLI's Northeast Cape to load equipment.

On Sept. 11, the landing craft Greta arrived to discharge and backload cargo for another village delivery. The vessel departed midday. The tug and barge Seahawk/Madison Rose arrived early in the morning and discharged and loaded cargo at the high ramp. The crew decided to layover due to winds and swell activity. The Arctic Bear also laid over another day due to bad weather.

On Sept. 12, the vessel Alaska Endeavor, chartered for NOAA research, arrived in the early morning and moored alongside the Arctic Bear's barge due to swell at the City Dock. All other traffic remained at the dock due to high winds.

Winds decreased on Saturday, Sept, 13. The improvement in weather conditions allowed the research ship Alaska Endeavor, the tug and barge Arctic Bear/Alaska Provider and the Seahawk/Madison Rose to depart.

On Sunday, Sept 14, the Paragon/DBL79 arrived at the dock mid-morning for a large fuel discharge that continued throughout the evening and Monday.

On Monday, Sept.15, the Paragon fuel discharge was still underway at the Causeway. The tug and barge Sesok/165-1 arrived at the East Dock mid-morning for a fuel discharge to harbor tanks.

The Pacific Raven/Kay's Point line haul barge waited offshore for dock space at the Causeway to discharge fuel product. The tanker vessel Themsestern remained offshore to reload lighter vessels to bring more fuel product to shore.

Baker also reports that the harbor repairs and upgrades project, including lighting, is nearing completion.

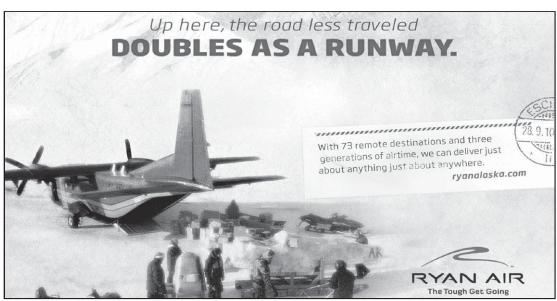

Repairs on the Fish Dock fenders and installation of light poles on East and South sides of harbor should be complete within the next week to 10 days, she reported on Monday.

SNAKE RIVER DREDGES— Strong winds kept most of the small gold dredging fleet inside the harbor and anchored at the Snake River mouth during the latter part of the last week.

Nome Homeschoolers go geocaching on Anvil Mountain

They did this to learn how to use

Geocaching is like hide-and-seek, but with a GPS.

A GPS is a small, handheld device that uses satellites. A geocache is a small plastic container that someone hides in the outdoors.

The GPS shows the location of something far away. Before the kids started hiking, they had to put the latitude and longitude for the geocache location in the GPS.

The older kids held the GPS units

Community Center. The kids followed an arrow that showed the direction of the geocache. The GPS also showed the distance of how far the kids were from the geocache.

Homeschoolers hiked up Anvil Mountain and found a geocache named The White Alice Towers Geocache.

The first kids there were Clara Hanson and Tobin Hobbs. Emelyne Hobbs, who was the oldest homeschool kid, wrote all of the names in the log book. Most of the kids put a small item in the geocache, and took something from the geocache.

Then they closed it and put it back in the hiding spot.

School district receives gift for JROTC, highlights cultural awareness

By Kristine McRae

Sitnasuak Native Corporation is showing its support for the JROTC program at Nome-Beltz again this year. Sitnasuak President Chuck Fagerstrom attended last week's school board meeting to present a check in support of what he called, "a real opportunity for students. We would love to see more students involved, for what it teaches, what they learn," Fagerstrom said, "I think they're going to utilize [the skills for the rest of their life.

In addition to the $100,000 for JROTC, Sitnasuak is donating $37,000 toward the summer school reading program. Fagerstrom told school board members that the Sitnasuak board was made aware of the low proficiency level of many Nome students in reading, writing, and math. He then shared information from a 2013 Gallup poll, "The state of America's schools show that we are focusing on the wrong things, which are what student's don't know and how ineffective teachers are. But what matters most; the greatest predictors of student success are hope, engagement, and well being.

If a child feels hope in the home and community, they will be able to thrive. We need to provide students with the sense that they are worthwhile and that they are cared about. Our primary obligation is to nurture our children's pride and growth. The elders commission came together to see what we could do to be supportive, as a community," Fagerstrom said, "and we came up with the cultural sensitivity training for teachers and the three-week intensive reading program for students. We hope the reading program will grow, grow, grow.

The cultural sensitivity training took place at this year's teacher inservice in August, and featured local presenters. Among those who shared aspects of Native culture was Vera Metcalf, to whom board member Barb Amarok presented the "Partner in Education" award. "Vera was gracious enough to share her expertise and knowledge with our teachers," Amarok said. "She was very well received, and we hope she will continue to share with the teachers and administrators.

Continuing the cultural theme to last week's meeting, high school Social Studies teacher and Nome Education Association vice president Kent Runion shared video highlights from the annual cultural camp for new teachers. Several teachers new to the region participated in the annual camp near White Mountain, at Tom and BeeJay Gray's fish camp, where they participated in subsistence activities and learned about traditional foods. Locally, members of the NEA reached out to new teachers for berry picking, hiking, and other activities. "We wanted them to get used to living in Nome," Runion said.

In other district news, schools superintendent Steve Gast reported continued progress in efforts to design a new teacher evaluation, which will debut in the 2015-2016 school year. "Teachers learned how the Alaska Cultural Standards are embedded into the evaluations. This year we're still using the old systems, but we'll be practicing the new process with the teacher involvement," Gast said.

District business manager Paula Coffman shared that the number of students participating in the free breakfast and lunch program is higher than expected. "We're still working out some of the bugs with the company," Coffman told the board, alluding to the financial agreement NPS has with the contractor NMS.

The district is considering which route to take to collect existing delinquent lunch bills, which total near $10,000. Coffman suggested using an outside agency to manage the collections once an initial notice has been sent. Board member Barb Nickels noted that free lunches now may make it easier for some parents to pay past-due bills. "Hopefully parents will be able to pay those fees, especially since they don't have current fees to pay," Nickels said.

Federal Programs manager Jon Berkeley was on hand to clarify Nome's eligibility for the free meals. "The program says we have to have a certain number of children eligible for free lunch in order to participate in the free lunch program. It's a three year eligibility program," Berkeley said, "We try to contact all the families in the Migrant Ed program. We don't want people to think that they don't need to apply for Migrant Ed, just because we get free lunch, because in fact those numbers would affect our eligibility." The board will further discuss options for collecting overdue lunch bills at their work session September 23.

This week, a group of homeschool students from Nome paid a visit to the Center for Puppetry Arts in Atlanta, Georgia. Thanks to modern technology, the students were able to attend a live presentation on rainforest birds, followed by a workshop session during which they created a tropical bird puppet. The presentation is part of a series of videoconferences that Nome librarian Marguerite LaRiviere has been able to offer to the community through the Alaska OWL (Online With Libraries) Project. By securing grant funds through the OWL Project, the library has been able to acquire broadband services and to provide a series of virtual field trips for elementary students. Videoconferences have been attended by classroom teachers at the elementary school, Anvil City Science Academy, and the Nome Youth Facility. These virtual field trips have allowed students to view genuine petroglyphs in Minnesota, dinosaur fossils in Canada, and to learn about sea mammals and birds of Alaska from experts at the Alaska Sealife Center in Seward. Students were also able to participate in a hands-on squid dissection workshop through the Sealife Center over the summer. "The trips are fun for the kids, but they are a special treat for educators as well," says LaRiviere. The grant also offers opportunities for community groups and individuals to request topics for their own videoconferences. Nome Eskimo Community's Outdoor Club participated in a puppetry workshop this summer, and LaRiviere arranged a videoconference with the Cleve-UNALAKLEET PERFORMANCE — Kira Eckenweiler sang opera selections in the gym at the Frank A. Degnan High School in Unalakleet on August, 2014. Tim Smith is at the piano, Timothy Wolcott, the local Unalakleet music teacher, is turning pages for him.

From the Northwest coast of Alaska comes an artistic surprise

By Kathleen McCoy

Most Alaskans wouldn't link the word opera with Unalakleet, a community of 700 located just at the mouth of its namesake river on Norton Sound.

Maybe not, until now. University of Alaska Anchorage vocal performance student and coloratura soprano Kira Eckenweiler grew up in Unalakleet. Dad Gary Eckenweiler moved there to teach school more than two decades ago and married Willa, a local Inupiaq woman.

Kira, 21, is the youngest of their two daughters.

Last month, while home working her third summer counting fish for the Alaska Department of Fish and Game, Kira was joined by UAA piano professor Tim Smith for a concert in Unalakleet's Frank A. Degnan High School gym; he on the piano, she at the mic. Together they performed selections from Leonard Bernstein's "Candide" and Mozart's "The Magic Flute."

Smith and Eckenweiler planned the performance during a school district in-service training, a rare moment when more than 300 teachers from all over the Bering Strait

Young Fisherman

School District would be in Unalakleet. They wanted to show teachers what's possible for a passionate and talented Alaskan from a remote community.

But it wasn't just schoolteachers who came. The bleachers were packed, "more than even at a basketball game," Gary Eckenweiler said. People were leaning in, "engaged with the music," said Timothy Wolcott, the local music teacher who arrived four years ago from New York to encounter Kira as a high school senior. "They were really listening."

Tears followed the recital, but not from Kira. Smith, Wolcott and Kira's parents all recounted how community members moved toward the young vocalist, wiping their eyes. "I don't think people expect to hear opera come out of a village girl's mouth," Kira said later. "I am so glad people were touched by my music."

Some of that emotion may be linked to a custom Willa Eckenweiler shared with me over the phone from Unalakleet. "We have a naming process in Inupiat culture,' she said, "a way to keep a name alive in the community.

Willa's mother and an aunt chose an Inupiat name for baby Kira -Apaachuaq. The woman who bore that name, a choir singer in church, died shortly before Kira's birth. She'd been a community leader, bringing Inupiat songs into church services, and she was also a close friend of the two older women.

"I think, especially among the older people here," said Gary, "they see Kira, and they think of her."

A rural Alaskan comfortable with subsistence fishing and even calling and shooting her own moose, Kira has grown into an artist. "I want to sing opera for the rest of my life," she said this week between classes at UAA. "I want to go all around the world, singing opera."

She'll perform this season with Anchorage Opera. In December she has a secondary role in "Madame Butterfly." In April, she performs a lead role in Mozart's "Impresario," the tale of an entrepreneur auditioning two competing singers. He hires them both, but what follows is a battle royale over who gets top billing and the biggest salary. Kira plays one of those singers in this comedy about artists and vanity.

Her dad's voice has a hint of both pride and sadness over the phone from Unalakleet. "I think this may be the last summer we'll see her at home," Gary said. "She's set her sights on traveling."

Indeed, Kira is preparing audition pieces to apply for a summer music program in Europe. Italy is her goal; it gets her closer to learning Italian, the language of many operas.

All this, from the little girl who would sing her way through long family canoe trips. Who won the school talent contest in fifth grade by singing from Disney's "Pocahontas." Who, in high school, set her mind to winning not just regionals, but statewide competitions for her singing, including earning one of only three "command performance" slots for vocalists her senior year.

That performance program from 2011 is peppered with names from big Alaska high schools: Dimond, Lathrop, West Valley, South, Palmer and Grace Christian. Unalakleet appears only once, next to Kira's name.

"She's probably, hands down, the most gifted singer I have ever worked with," said Mari Hahn, an associate professor of music at UAA. "She's got depth, strength, courage." Hahn acknowledged the power of supportive parents and a home community that will come out to hear her Opera is a hugely competitive field, Hahn said. She predicted Kira will spend the next few years at a larger music center, polishing her skills and preparing for a national or international career. "She has the inner strength and character to withstand all the pressures," Hahn said.

Besides, she quipped, "Kira's the only student who ever told me she needed to miss class to go hunt, then brought me back a big slab of moose for my freezer.'

Kathleen McCoy works at UAA, where she highlights campus life through social and online media.

Jake Stettenbenz to swim for Southwest Oregon Community College

By Kirsten Bey

2014 Nome-Beltz graduate Jake Stettenbenz is heading to Coos Bay, Oregon to swim for Southwest Oregon Community College. Jake, son of Bonnie Piscoya Reynolds and Dave Stettenbenz, started swimming with the Nome Northstar Swim Team when he was in grade school and continued with the Nome-Beltz Nanooks High School team. NNSST Coach Sharon Keeney said "I think it is exciting to have a swimmer who began with the Northstars as a newbie and continued consistently swimming every season through graduation and now beyond to the next level! It has been a delight to watch someone who loves the challenge of the water develop as a swimmer, as he has grown. I look forward to seeing his swimming career continue in college.'

Jake is the first Nome-Beltz graduate to commit to a college to participate in a swimming program. Liz Korenek-Johnson was a walk-on to the swim team at Pacific Lutheran.

According to John Gunther of the Coos Bay World, 6/12/14, "Southwestern Oregon Community College often has been on the cutting edge for two-year schools, over the years adding dorms and the Oregon Coast Culinary Institute among other things. Now the Lakers are doing the same in sports, adding a swimming program — the only one in the Northwest among community colleges."

Sandra Bullock will be coaching the new swimming program. In anticipation of this new program, she sent recruitment notices about the program to swimming programs around the Northwest. An email message landed in the in-boxes of Northstar coaches Sharon Keeney and Kirsten Bey. Coach Keeney immediately thought of Jake. Coach Bullock is excited to have Jake commit to the program and is looking forward to having him on her first team

Coach Bullock said that SWOCC hopes to give local swimmers an opportunity to continue their careers in college and also to provide an opportunity for swimmers in the region who don't quite have the background to compete in Division I or Division II schools. Coach Bullock confirms that Jake is the farthest north recruit and she is looking forward to his arrival saying that Jake will challenge and be challenged by his teammates.

The SWOCC Lakers will compete in meets with several of the smaller 4-year colleges in Oregon and Washington. So far, meets have been arranged with Willamette University and Pacific University in Oregon and Pacific Lutheran University and Seattle-Pacific College in the Tacoma-Seattle area. There is also a National Swim Meet in March that SWOCC swimmers could qualify for.

Focusing on just one sport for the school year will be a new experience for Jake. Like most Nome-Beltz athletes, he participated in a variety of sports during his high school career. Jake is excited to see how his swimming will develop when he is able to really concentrate on swimming.

Classes start at SWOCC on September 29 so Jake in the final process of getting ready to head to Coos Bay. Wish Jake well if you see him around town before he takes off to college.

Nome volleyball girls nipped by Kotzebue in Nanooks' season opener

By Keith Conger

The Kotzebue girl volleyballers made up for a two-year winless streak against the Nome-Beltz Lady Nanooks on Friday by defeating their rivals to the south three games to one on the Huskies' Senior Night in Kotzebue. The Huskies duplicated that feat in the Saturday morning contest with another three to one victory.

While Nome would begin the season 0-2, the Huskies remained undefeated. They were able to take care of the perennial powerhouse, the Barrow Lady Whalers, last week at home and are off to one their best starts in years with a 4-0 record.

The Nanooks, Huskies, and Whalers are joined by the Bethel Warriors in the Western Alaska Volleyball Conference. According to Huskies coach Jessa Baray, this is geographically the largest high school sports region in the United States.

Two of the four teams will advance from the Western Conference to the state tournament in November. A team's winning percentages within the conference determine seeding at this year's regional tournament in Nome, so these early matches mean a lot.

On any given year, with so few members in the conference, there is a high degree of familiarity between the teams. That has been magnified in recent years by a coaches' game of "musical chairs." Third year Nanooks' coach Lucas Frost led the flurry of coaching changes. He was formerly the middle school volleyball coach in Kotzebue three years ago.

Kotzebue, however, seems to have gained the most potential for knowing its conference opponents. First year Huskies coach Baray was the JV coach in Bethel last year. Her assistant coach Garrett Danner was the JV coach in Barrow last season.

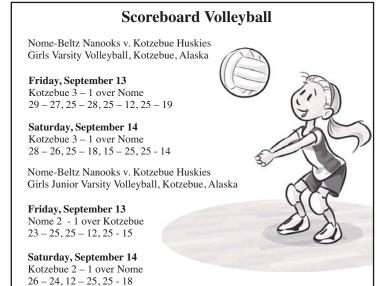

Some of the girls that Frost coached in middle school had a hand in defeating their former coach. Freshman Cassidy Kremer led the Huskies in blocks. Double sport standout, freshman Calia Sien, who won the high school girls cross country running race in Kotzebue last weekend, led the team in digs (the stat given when a player reaches low to the ground to keep a ball in play that has been sent over the net by an opponent).

Nome was led in blocks by senior Jane Tidwell, a transfer student who played for Eielson High School in Fairbanks last year. Junior Allaryce Agloinga led Nanooks in kill shots (the statistic given for when a player sends the ball across the net and scores a point).

The Nanooks JV squad beat the Huskies JV squad Friday night 2 games to 1. The Huskies came back to defeat the Nanooks on Saturday 2 – 1.

The Lady Nanooks varsity squad will travel to Anchorage next weekend to play in the West High Volleyball Tournament.

LITTLE RUNNERS - Competitors in the Elementary School race blast off the starting line behind the Nome-Beltz High School on Saturday, September 13.

Hoogendorn sets new course record at Nome Invitational running meet

By Keith Conger

In a five-kilometer (3.1 mile) cross country race, a second of time can be lost in many ways. On Saturday, Nome-Beltz sophomore Wilson Hoogendorn found a way to save every second —and gain exactly one — as he set a new course record at the 2014 Nome Invitational running Hoogendorn's time of 19 minutes, 19 seconds, was exactly one second faster than the record breaking time put in by Spencer Woods of Kotzubue last year. His strong performance was much needed, as the Nome and Kotzebue boys teams met for the third time this year, the first time with both teams at full strength.

Nanook freshman Harrison Moore made a positive statement for the youth of the Nanooks by finishing in third place with a time of 20:29. The first and third place finishes of Nome's top two runners helped the team edge Kotzebue for the team award by a score of 26 to Kotzebue, led by second place finisher Gary Eakin, had more runners in the top five than did Nome. Harry Baldwin and Eakin's brother Zeke came in four seconds apart, placing fourth and fifth respectively.

Although Eakin ran a fast race at 20:20, he was still a full minute behind. Showing classy sportsmanship, Eakin said that Hoogendorn had what it took today to climb the big, centerpiece hill on the course. "The hill is pretty tough. It's all mental," he said. "When you get to the top, if you still have that mentality, the race is yours.'

The Nanooks' victory at home made up for a defeat at the hands of Kotzebue last weekend on their home turf. With Barrow having beaten the Kotzebue boys in Barrow two weeks ago, the Region 1 North Championships in Norvik on September 20 will be quite a test for the young Nanooks boys team.

With the Lady Nanooks top runner Christine Buffas resting a sore leg, the Nome-Beltz girls needed someone to step up in their showdown with the Kotzebue girls. They found just what they needed in freshman Mary Fiskeaux, who won the gold medal in a time of 25:56.

Fiskeaux, surprised herself at the meet. "I'm pretty excited. I didn't expect to be first. I wasn't that fast last year. But this year I pushed myself more," said the second year run-

Nome-Beltz sophomore Bianca Trowbridge and senior Alexis Hutson completed the podium sweep for the Nanooks. Kotzebue's Moira Sheldon's fourth place finish paced the Lady Huskies, who ended up with 47 points. They fell short in the team award to Nome which scored

The meet was attended by Bering Strait School District teams from Teller, Golovin, and Koyuk. The top BSSD finishers for the high school races were both from Teller. Jazzlyn Garnie cracked the top five in the girls race, and Jared Topkok's effort led to an eighth place finish in the boys race.

The Nome-Beltz junior high girls copied their older teammates by taking the top three spots. They were led by seventh-grader Ava Earthman, whose time of 26:24 would have earned her a second place in the high school girl's race. She was followed by Starr Erikson and Daynon Medlin respectively Kotzebue's Trevor Hickerson won the junior high school boys race in a time of 21:44. He was followed by Nome teammates Benjamin Cross and Brayden Bahnke.

The top BSSD finishers in the junior high race were Teller's Kiara Okleasik who came in fifth place, and Teller's Nicholas Topkok who came in seventh place.

Elementary aged children had the opportunity to run a 1-mile race. The top three finishers for the boys were Son Erikson, Colin McFarland, and Tobin Hobbs. The top three finishers for the girls were Natalie Tobuk, Cathy Okbaok of Teller, and Katie

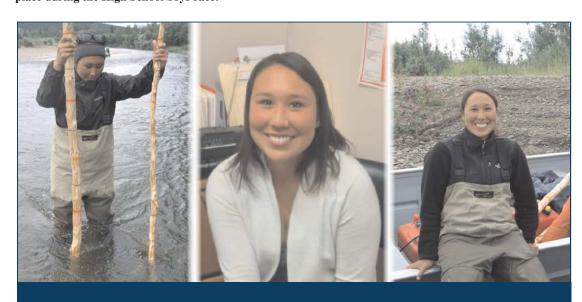

In the fall of 2010 the Nome-Beltz cross country running course was slightly redesigned. Hoogendorn now has the record on that course.

FIRST ACROSS THE LINE - Nome-Beltz High School Runner Wilson Hoogendorn breaks the tape for first place during the High School boys race.

Mindful eating without guilt

By Sarah Miller

"It's OK to enjoy food without guilt," says NSHC dietician Olivia Meyers. The philosophy that weight loss and health goals can be achieved without forbidding the pleasures of eating is part of "mindful eating", an alternative to dieting that the hospital's CAMP (Chronic Care Active Management and Prevention Program) department is making available to the community through its 10 in 10 Program. The 10 in 10 program started in 2011, and was originally designed to support participants in losing ten pounds in ten weeks, with weekly weigh ins and education on weight loss topics.

Mindful eating represents a shift from "dieting" that emphasizes calorie counting and food tracking, to enjoying food, and being conscious of one's eating habits and the feelings that accompany eating. "Many of our program participants are repeaters in the 10 in 10 program. We wanted to provide them with something that allows them to think differently about food. Mindful eating is a diet-free approach," explained Megan Timm, Prevention Program Coordinator.

Mindful eating seeks to focus attention on the acts of choosing and preparing food, truly savoring and tasting it, and thinking consciously about factors that influence how, when and why we eat. "We don't eat to live anymore," explained Meyers. "We eat on the go, in the car, on the couch, when our minds are occupied with tasks, lists, errands or what's on TV. We're not tasting food or caring about it, or reflecting on how we feel after eating Eating with awareness can lead to healthier food choices, more control over habits and cravings, and can train people to eat for hunger and satisfaction, rather than in response to emotional needs. It also allows one to eat to satiety, or fullness, without overeating, which occurs when food is consumed too quickly or distractedly. If the brain requires at least 20 minutes to register fullness, a slower, more deliberate approach to consuming food can lead to more appropriate portion sizes and more healthful food choices. "We can start choosing smaller portions because we are noticing and appreciating the taste, color, and texture of food. It's these healthier, more wholesome foods that lead to the ability to feel satisfied without guilt," said Timm.

While this approach seems less restrictive than a traditional diet, encouraging enjoyment of good food, it is not a simple task. "This is a mindset change. A diet, like cutting out carbs, might actually be easier than this," commented Timm. "But unlike a diet, this is sustainable, and the practice can be a lifelong habit."

At the 10 for 10 support group meeting, participants took a quiz to assess their current mindful eating habits, and received tips for developing these habits. Suggestions include being "in the moment", that is, being fully focused on the task of eating rather than eating while watching television, answering emails or working through lunch.

Participants were encouraged to observe and honor one's hunger levels, and to savor the texture, aroma, sight, and flavor of their food. Finally, participants were encouraged to change their vocabulary about food from a negative, judgmental, and guilt-ridden approach to a more compassionate and deliberate approach. For example, suggested Meyers and Timm, enjoying a sweet treat by eating it slowly and allowing the body to taste and enjoy the experience will reduce the likelihood of later cravings when the body is not actually hungry.

The philosophy of mindful eating fits with other ways the CAMP department is seeking to help community members develop healthy habits. CAMP has been part of Norton Sound Health Corporation's community wellness and outreach efforts for the past 15 years. It provides programs oriented toward preventing and managing diabetes, including services such as nutrition therapy and services, screenings, counseling for tobacco cessation and exercise programs, nutrition education in schools, and Summercise. The department is about to launch a 30 Day Fitness Challenge, beginning October 1 and continuing over the next six month. Participants will follow a daily calendar of exercise challenges, and will earn incentives for completing the month's challenges. For each consecutive month of completion, the incentives grow, explained Timm.

Mindful eating fits neatly into the approach the CAMP department already takes with nutrition services. "We try to encourage consumption of traditional Native, subsistence foods as much as possible, when prepared in their traditional form, explained Meyers. The approach of mindful eating supports the relationship to food found within Native culture. The lengthy and demanding process of traditional ways of harvesting, preparing, and preserving meat, fish, berries and greens lends itself to an appreciation of the food. The care and pride that went into its harvesting and preparation enhances the physical and emotional satisfaction that comes from eating Native subsistence foods.

Just as subsistence practices support cultural and physical wellbeing, mindful eating promotes balance, choice, wisdom, and acceptance of food. "This is enjoyable. It includes practices that are sustainable and lifelong. We are not picking on food or banning things that people enjoy," said Timm.

Saying it Sincerely

Pastor Charles Brower Community United Methodist Church Member of the Nome Ministerial Association

How do we understand the mission of the church in the Seward Peninsula? It is crucial we begin with understanding God's mission. God calls each of us to participate in his actions in our world. As God's people we need to discern his actions and participate in his mission. Church remains the best way for us to participate in a visible way, participating in our communities as his people.

Occasionally church fails to be a church! In these occasions we preach another gospel than to "Love Him, and to love our neighbors." Occasionally church fails to be a church when we become a "club for the benefit of our members." We develop inwardness, institutional maintenance, selfcenteredness and no longer striving to discern how best we can be used by God for his larger mission.

I trust God will work in each of our lives to call our churches to remain true to his reasons and plans for "church." Participate in the community of faith and help our churches stay true to God's mission!

land Museum of Natural History in Ohio during Iditarod week that was open to the public. The museum houses the remains of Balto, the sled dog made famous in the diphtheria serum run of 1925. Videoconferences have even included a reading of Hamlet with Shakespearean actors from Juneau.

For this week's workshop, homeschool parent Stacie Motis researched topics from the Center for Interactive Learning and Collaboration (CILC) website, where educators can find videoconference content providers, read reviews of programs offered, and select programs that align to learning objectives and state standards. "I was wanting to expose my kids to instructors and professionals who really have a passion about the things they are sharing. This is a hands on way to get kids excited about what they are learning, and to engage them in topics and experts we might not have access to here," said Motis. She selected the rainforest puppet program for this week as well as an upcoming videoconference on seasons, presented by the Challenger Learning Center in West Virginia. The workshop will integrate geography and science to explain how the position and tilt of the Earth in relation to the sun determines the sea-

LaRiviere would like to see the use of videoconferencing among school and community groups continue to grow. "Right now, our biggest deterrent is space," she explained. "We have some interesting programs that are open to the public coming up but we can only offer them during the library's off hours because we just don't have enough space." Blueprints for the new library building include a conference room to be shared with the museum, as well as a smaller study room within the library itself that will allow for more participants in videoconferences and more regularly scheduled programming.

Funding for the videoconferences could become another deterrent as well, when the OWL grant ends at the end of September. LaRiviere is in the process of seeking new funding. "We definitely want to continue to offer these types of programs to the community," she said.

TERRA broadband network heads toward Kotzebue

By Keith Conger

Representatives from health corporations, schools, and private industry met on Thursday at the Nullagvik Hotel in Kotzebue to discuss the expansion of TERRA, GCI's broadband network. "This is a celebration for connecting the Arctic," said Bob Walsh, GCI's director of Rural Broadband Development.

TERRA stands for Terrestrial in Every Rural Region of Alaska. Walsh says the project is aimed atimproving the way rural Alaskan communities receive their phone, television, and internet communications.

Due to geographical logistics, these off-the-road system communities have historically relied on satellite connections that were inherent with high latency.

Walsh says that high latency translates to slow speeds. When a signal has to travel 26,000 miles up to a satellite, and then 26,000 miles back, things slow down, says Walsh.

TERRA provides a terrestrial, or land based, connection to the faster fiber optic cable backbone in Anchorage.

The goal of TERRA, says Ron Duncan, president and CEO of GCI, is to give rural villages access to the same 21st century technology that much of the rest of the world enjoys.

"We have been driven by the technology needs of education and the health field," Duncan explains.

"We were as much driven by providers here as anyone. The folks in this region pushed the envelope in education and health care the past 20 years"

"I've never been happy about how slow information moves up here," said Eugene Smith, CIO of Maniilaq Association, who has been a driving force in helping to bring these new technologies to the northwest. "Technology has not only improved education, but it has definitely improved health care."

Smith is excited that in December, Kotzebue will be joining the 72 Alaskan villages currently receiving the advanced possibilities TERRA provides.

Duncan explained that the best way for rural schools and health care facilities to receive communication will ultimately be a fiber optic cable link.

There are many difficulties encountered, however, when trying to procure rural land permits. The logistics and costs of maintaining cable over vast stretches of tundra also makes running fiber optic cable from village to village impossible.

The TERRA project, with its microwave towers, was the answer GCI came up with when they envisioned connecting the Arctic said Duncan.

The TERRA maps provided by Duncan showed that fiber optic cable has been laid as far as Levelock near Dillingham in southwest Alaska. From that point, a series of towers were built on hilltops throughout rural Alaska that could both collect and send microwave signals line-of-sight.

The old analog signals traveling to outer space are subject to atmospheric disturbances. But the new digital microwave pulse is not. This makes microwaves more reliable and faster.

Duncan explained that in 2011, towers were constructed linking 65 Southwestern Alaska communities including Bethel. In 2012, towers were added so that the broadband signal could be reached as far north as Shaktoolik. Then in 2013, towers were constructed on Cape Nome, as well as behind the Norton Sound Regional Hospital, linking Nome to the system.

Norton Sound Health Corporation's chief information officer TwoSix is excited about being a part of bringing these technologies to places that have yet to experience them. "The reason I came to Alaska is that this is like what Eisenhower did back in the 1950s with bringing the Interstate Highway system to America," he said.

"In the lower 48, the structure is already in place," said TwoSix. "[Broadband] is actually changing the lives of people in the area."

One of these changes comes through TeleHealth Services. According to TwoSix, the new broadband capabilities greatly enhance health care providers' ability to deliver assistance to rural communities.

"People can actually live in another place like Thailand, and still provide services," says TwoSix.

Many village clinics now have the ability to be directly connected with health care providers in the larger hospitals in Nome, Kotzebue, or even Anchorage. By increasing TeleHealth services, trips to the actual "brick and mortar" facilities are decreased, which results in cost savings, says TwoSix. This represents a "shifting focus from reactive medicine to a proactive method."

An added benefit, says TwoSix, is that employee retention is increased. Veteran health care providers with important knowledge of the people and customs of the region, and those who no longer wish to, or are not able to, live in rural communities, can stay active in the system.

Northwest Arctic Borough School District superintendent Dr. Annmarie O'Brien, who represents nearly 2000 students, is also excited that refinements are coming their way. O'Brien says that she has seen big changes in education in her years in rural Alaska. She is happy that TERRA will bring students in her district greater access to technology in school.

O'Brien says that the increased assessment demands of modern education requires more bandwidth. Her district has computerized MAP testing three times a year, and is getting ready for the upcoming electronic state standardized testing.

O'Brien looks forward to the benefits greater bandwidth will provide her staff, saying the "opportunities this has opened up for professional development are truly phenomenal."

The other added benefit O'Brien anticipates for her school district is having services on the internet, as opposed to a local server, will put less stress on district maintenance and upkeep.

Any advances in helping to alleviate the many hours the district requires for local repair services will be a plus.

Betty Huntington, CEO of Gana-A'Yoo Limited, a corporation whose shareholders come from the Yukon River villages of Galena, Koyukuk, Nuloto, and Kaltag, cant wait for TERRA and its high speed internet to get to the interior. "Our people have changed over the years. For hundreds of years our people have had to be flexible. Broadband internet will allow us to have healthier communities that can live the way we want to live."

Duncan says that delivering TERRA to the Yukon River will bring GCI another step closer toward "closing the ring" by connecting the current system of towers with Fairbanks. The next phase of the project, TERRA Yukon, is slated for finalization next year. Completing a circuit, explains Duncan, "will allow for double band widths."

Dennis Meiners, CEO of Intelligent Energy Systems, added to the themes of the day by saying "we must innovate to maintain a high quality of life." He reminded the group at the meeting that another big advantage that greater bandwidth can provide is to help the "affordable energy in rural Alaska problem." He states that the excess wind energy being generated in rural wind farms is currently inaccessible because it needs to be metered differently, specifically, it needs a "smart meter" and smart meters need access to the internet.

Meiners explained that once the wind turbine systems can tie into the internet, they can be accessed and monitored from somewhere else. This can provide service people with the ability to "remotely pinpoint power problems down to the individual transformer or the actual individual pole."

Changes in technologies such as those provided by TERRA can lead to increases in opportunities for economic expansion is an idea not lost on Art Ivanoff, CEO of Bering Sea Alliance, LLC. Ivanoff says he is happy that his hometown of Unalakleet is receiving TERRA service, but the villages most affected by the increases in traffic in the Bering Sea, such as Gambell, are often the least accessible villages. These villages have a lot to gain from an economic standpoint, and from a public health standpoint, but they need high-speed communications to realize these

Reich was leading a tour demonstrating how Kiana's progressive clinic is ready for the next phase of GCI's TERRA project.

"If projections of global warming are true, then we must continue to find ways to get services like TERRA to even the most isolated of villages," says Ivanoff. "We need to make sure that we do not leave any segment of the population behind.

Regional leaders discuss impacts of increased shipping

By Diana Haecker

Tribal and municipal leaders from the Bering Strait region gathered last week in Nome to begin the process of devising a plan that will put the Bering Strait region in a better position to actively cope with the increase in maritime traffic.

Climate change-driven melting of the summer sea ice in the Arctic regions opens up shipping routes that could mean immense cost savings for cargo ships and tankers to transport goods from Asia to Europe or vice versa.

Traffic heading to or from the Arctic Oceans, be it via the Northwest Passage or the Northern Sea Route, would have to pass the narrow Bering Strait, which also is a major highway for marine mammal migrations

Those whales, seals, walruses and wild birds are food sources for coastal Alaskans. More maritime traffic could bring negative impacts to coastal villages that depend on the health of the sea, land and air to support the animals hunted for subsistence.

Kawerak Inc. President Melanie Bahnke recently stood before a gathering of national journalists covering environmental issues, bringing to their awareness one very important aspect that is often overlooked. "There is one story that is not told in the context of climate change: It's the story of the Native people living in the Arctic," Bahnke said.

As climate change impacts land, air and sea, ice-dependent animals like polar bears, seals and walrusesmost conversations deal with the health and integrity of the environment and do not take into account that people still rely on the wild food supply that nature offers.

"I don't want us to become an endangered species," Bahnke said in her opening speech at the gathering titled "Bering Strait Voices on Shipping" last week.

The event was organized by Kawerak Inc. and was funded by the Pew Charitable Trust and the Oak Foundation, who helped to bring together regional leaders.

The gathering's purpose was to begin the process of building a regional plan for proactive stewardship of the marine environment. The gathering was held on Sept. 16 and

Planning panel hands Council a revised parking ordinance

By Sandra L. Medearis

The Nome Planning Commission has taken in hand a plan to grapple with the mish-mash parking practices that clutter the roadsides with vehicles.

At its regular meeting Sept. 16, the panel voted unanimously to pass a revised parking ordinance along with new regulations for off-street parking to the Nome Common Council for that group's comments and adoption.

The planners spent months to address the public safety needs for off street parking to clear roadways on Nome's city streets.

The proposed document repeals several existing ordinances and combines them under a single ordinance addressing parking requirements for buildings, businesses and dwellings.

No one spoke at the public hearing on the parking plan.

The proposal states the standard number of off street parking spaces required for all uses in all zoning districts. In most cases, public parking or street parking places do not count toward the number of off street parking places needed.

However, the regulations do not apply to any building immediately adjacent to the following "downtown" state streets: Front Street from Campbell Way to Bering Street; Bering Street from Front Street to West Fifth Avenue; Seppala Drive from Bering Street to West F Street.

Here are some of the requirements pertaining to new building construction, expansions or change in use to be spelled out at the time building permits are pulled:

For single dwelling units, two private parking spaces for each dwelling unit.

For duplexes or more units, one and one-half spaces for each dwelling unit.

For bed and breakfast homes, one space for each three guest rooms plus the number of spaces for the dwelling units.

Buildings other than dwellings:

Criminals attempt to torch former hospital complex

By Sandra L. Medearis

Vandals have applied considerable destructive efforts to the old Norton Sound Regional Hospital, but did not succeed in attempts to burn down the complex.

One of the owners, Jim Gribben, discovered the mess when he checked the premises on Sunday, Sept. 14.

Gribben and police found paper towels rolled through the halls upstairs and down in both the old and newer sections of the buildings along with reams of pages from manuals and loose-leaf notebooks.

The criminals had attempted to fire off the towels at intervals along the halls

Although most of the trashing has been cleaned up last week, evidence of fire starts still mark the carpets, which Gribben said are flame retardant.

"I think they were trying to burn down the whole complex, with a very intentional domino effect," Gribben said. "They found cases of towel rolls, cases of paper, cases of new file folders and spread them methodically through all the halls, through the clinic, through the inpatient acute care area, and up the stairs and through the office area to carry the fire"

Nome Police Dept. dispatch staff said Monday that they have no suspects, but there is an ongoing investigation.

Gribben is offering a reward for anyone coming forward to give police information leading to the arrest and conviction of the culprits.

A tour of the vacant buildings Monday showed wires hanging down from big holes in the ceilings where vandals had ripped out electric "EXIT" signs and security cameras.

The vandals bashed glass out of office doors and removed glass half-walls and windows enclosing a patient benefits screening office.

Dear Editor:

Thoughts on our flag!

To truly respect our country, you must first understand and respect its symbolism as well. And towering high above all of these proud and battle-tested icons of democracy, must be hoisted our nation's flag!

The problem is that far too many of our people, politicians included, now take for granted that which was paid for in the blood, sweat, tears, and toil of generations of patriots! "Worse yet are those who go through the motions without knowing the reasons why, or those who show but outward respect alone, but who fail to feel what it really means to be a proud and dedicated citizen of this great nation of ours?

I have noticed that many people, including politicians, show outward and transient respect for our flag, but fail to grasp what really went into its matrix? Not the materials alone, nor the colors that decorate its facade, but rather that which cannot be seen at first glance - the invisible properties that make up the intrinsic content and value of Old Glory herself.

This is not just any flag after all, it is our flag! It is a member of our family, it is a portion of our heritage, and it is what defines our very being! Let no man or nation ever make light of it, or attempt to cast it asunder! For in doing so, they also belittle all that this flag truly stands for, and that my friends, is your life and liberty itself!

Again, this is your flag - treat it with respect, love, and dedication. And most of all, treat it as you would a beloved member of your family. This flag stands behind you, and helped to protect you and your ancestors ever since our impossible dream first became a reality. And although the design of our flag may have changed from time to time, the love and sacrifices that went into its creation have always remained a constant, and these colors do not fade, nor do they forever give up the

Politicians will come and go, and political parties may gain or wane in power and prestige with the passing of time, but with our vigilance, and the help of the almighty himself, this nation of ours, her flag, and most of all what we truly stand for, will remain eternal!

This past month has brought a number of opportunities for the community and parents to engage with student and school related activities.

Our open house on September 10 went very well. We had a very nice showing of parents and community members who came by and visited with our teachers and staff.

On Saturday September 13 Nome-Beltz hosted a cross country track meet in which athletes from Koyuk, Teller, Golovin, Kotzebue and Nome competed in this annual event. This activity required volunteer help from a number of parents and community members.

On September 17, we held a health fair in which we had representatives from Norton Sound health Corporation, Public Health Center, and Nome Community Center conduct screenings of our students and staff. These screenings were in the following areas; vision, hearing, tuberculosis, and Body Mass Index (BMI). There were also a number of displays set up by representatives from Healthy Start, CAMP, Nome Community Center and Nome Public Health Center.

It's been a busy month and we at Nome-Beltz would be remiss if we failed to recognize the parent and community support we have received for our students and the activities they engaged in. Thank you for being there for

That was funny because I am not one to stifle my opinions. Not to exaggerate, but the next evening between 6:30 and 8:00 six more opinion pollsters called. #### Sixth lowest sea ice extent

On September 17, the Arctic sea ice has reached its likely minimum extent for 2014, the National Snow and Ice Data Center reports. This vear's ice coverage is the sixth lowest in the satellite record and reinforces the long-term downward trend in Arctic ice extent. Sea ice extent will now begin its seasonal increase through autumn and winter. Meanwhile, sea ice in the Antarctic has surpassed the previous record maximum extent set in 2013 and is now more than 7.72 million square miles for the first time in the past 35 years.

This year's minimum was 622,000 square miles above the record minimum extent from September 16, 2012. This year's minimum is 463,000 square miles below the average minimum set between 1981 and 2010.

This year, the ice cover remained more extensive over the Barents and Kara seas compared to last year. The most notable feature was the lack of ice north of the Laptev Sea that at one point in the melt season extended beyond 85 degrees North latitude. within 342 miles of the North Pole. This year was also unusual compared to recent years in that the Northwest Passage remained closed. On the other side of the Arctic, the Northern Sea Route or Northeast Passage opened with little ice near most of the shipping route along the coast of

Alaskans support EPA's proposed protections for Bristol Bay

The Environmental Protection Agency has received a record number of public comments asking for Clean Water Act protection for Bristol Bay, according to initial estimates. An EPA comment period closed last Friday. Nearly 20,000 Alaskans weighed in with support for the EPA's proposed protections for the salmon-rich region of southwest Alaska, and against the proposed Pebble Mine.

On July 21, EPA published in the Federal Register a Notice of Proposed Determination, under Section 404(c) of the Clean Water Act, to restrict the use of certain waters in the South Fork Koktuli River, North Fork Koktuli River and Upper Talarik Creek watersheds in Southwest Alaska as disposal sites for dredged or fill material associated with mining the Pebble deposit, a copper-, gold-, and molybdenum-bearing ore body. The notice established a public comment period that ended September 19, 2014. The EPA held seven hearings throughout Southwest Alaska during the week of August 11, 2014.

More than 830 community members participated in the seven hearings, more than 300 of whom provided oral statements. In addition to testimony taken at the hearings, as of September 11, 2014, EPA had received over 155,000 written comments.

Many public comments cited the failure of the Mount Polley tailings dam in British Columbia as evidence that accidents are inevitable in mines the size and scale of the proposed Pebble Mine. Bristol Bay tribes issued a release saying that Bristol Bay communities alone submitted over 1,500 written comments supporting Environmental Protection Agency's proposed restrictions to protect the waters of Bristol Bay from mines like Pebble. In addition to threats to the watershed, Alaskan comments focused on existing fish-based business in Bristol Bay that cannot coexist with large-scale mining. Over 150 Alaska sportfishing businesses have voiced their support for EPA's proposal, along with members of Bristol Bay tribes, and thousands of local residents and commercial fishermen. The EPA will complete a final count and review of the comments before issuing a final Recommended Determination no later than February 4, 2015. The agency extended the time period to issue the decision "upon a show of good cause," officials wrote in a Friday notice published in the Federal Register. "To allow full consideration of the extensive administrative record, including public comments, EPA finds there is good cause to extend the time period," the federal register reads.

The agency proposed in July to put tight restrictions on the Pebble Mine that its developer Northern Dynasty Minerals said would effectively kill the project. Officials said Pebble's waste materials would get into nearby wetlands and waterways and harm nearby Bristol Bay.

First Arctic cargo ship to sail NWP unescorted

Fednav. a Canadian-owned company announced that its vessel, the MV Nunavik began its voyage last week from Deception Bay to China via Canada's Northwest Passage, with a full cargo of nickel concentrate. The Nunavik will be one of the first commercial vessels to transit the Northwest Passage completely and the first to do so unescorted with an Arctic cargo.

Fednav in a press release boasts that the Nunavik is the most powerful conventional, non-nuclear icebreaking bulk carrier in the world. It sails from Deception Bay, Northern Quebec year round, transporting product from the Canadian Royalties mine. The Nunavik will deliver 23,000 tons of nickel concentrate to Bayuguan in China, through the NW Passage and eventually through the Bering Strait.

The Nunavik will be supported by a shore-based team of ice navigation specialists from Fednav and its subsidiary, Enfotec. The press release said, the route via the Northwest Passage to China is some 40 percent shorter than the traditional Panama Canal route, and as a result, will reduce greenhouse gas emissions by more than 1,300 tonnes.

"Fednav is proud to have designed this remarkable ship and to plan the first independent commercial voyage through the Northwest Passage," said Paul Pathy, President and co-CEO of Fednav Limited. The ship's progress can be tracked at http://www.fednav.com/en/voyage-nunavik

New research finds Arctic ice absorbs CO2

The web publication Phys.org reports that scientists have recently realized that sea ice has an impact on the planet's CO<sub>2</sub> balance. Danish scientists report that Arctic summers will see an acceleration of climate warming because reduced sea ice in the Arctic will remove less CO2 from the atmosphere.

Dorte Haubjerg Søgaard, PhD Fellow with the Nordic Center for Earth Evolution, University of Southern Denmark and the Greenland Institute of Natural Resources in Nuuk said that if her research is representative, then sea ice plays a greater role than expected in absorbing CO2.

Scientist have long known that the Earth's oceans are able to absorb huge amounts of CO2. However, thinking that ice is impenetrable, the Arctic oceans were left out of the equation. New research shows that sea ice in the Arctic draws large amounts of CO2 from the atmosphere into the ocean. Søgaard's studies show that sea ice may have a major impact on the global carbon cycle, and that chemical processes have a much greater impact on the sea ice's ability to remove CO2 than biological processes by algae binding of carbon in organic material.

Another important discovery is that every winter flower-like ice formations are formed on the surface of newly formed sea ice. They are called frost flowers. Søgaard has discovered that these frost flowers hold extremely high concentrations of calcium carbonate, which can have a further significant impact on the potential CO<sub>2</sub> uptake in the Arctic.

Stove-in walls allow views into adjoining rooms.

Local folk are still talking about the electrical storm that hit Nome with a boom of thunder and lightning that Sunday. Gribben figures that Saturday night or Sunday morning the vandals entered the laundry room window between the buildings, concealed from view of road and foot traffic.

"There were pools of mud and water on the floor and the window was swinging open when I got in here Sunday. I think that was their last visit, the night of the storm," Gribben said.

Gribben thought vandals had been hanging out in the hospital multiple times with different individuals using it as a "date" pad.

"They left condoms here and there and even in the morgue," he said. "They defecated on the floor in some of the rooms. Here, look here,' Gribben said, showing a reporter an empty energy drink can sitting on a clinic counter. "The place is loaded with DNA evidence.

"It's just a shame, to destroy and damage a valuable resource like this," Gribben said. "These buildings have been serving the community since 1948 with various vital and beneficial programs."

The hospital covers a city block comprising a dozen parcels at Fifth Avenue and Bering Street.

The hospital has been empty since Norton Sound Health Corp. moved their hospital services into a $200 million complex built at the east end of Greg Kruschek Road. Gribben invested in the old hospital earlier this year and is looking for a community service oriented nonprofit idea that needs a home.

PLENTY OF CONCERNS, PLENTY OF IDEAS—Municipal and tribal delegates from the Bering Strait region gathered for two days last week to tackle concerns raised due to increased maritime traffic through the Bering Strait. The gathering aimed to set the stage for the region to develop its own Bering Strait Arctic plan. The White House has released an Arctic Policy and implementation plan and the Alaska Arctic Policy Plan Commission is working on state plan, to be presented to the Legislature in January 2015.

17 at the Nome Mini Convention Center.

It marked the first region-wide tribal and municipal get-together to tackle climate driven changes in a regional forum.

Also present were U.S. Coast Guard Commander James Houck, Executive Director of the Institute of the North Nils Andreassen, Inuit Circumpolar Council Traditional Knowledge/Science Advisor Caroline Behe, UAF Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield and representatives of the funding foundations.

In her opening remarks Bahnke summarized the challenges connected with an uncertain future that climate change brings. The tide of new marine traffic that will come, whether coastal residents approve of it or not, tops the list. Also, over the last three years unprecedented events continue to stress the region's residents. Those events come in the form of fall storms that erode and flood low lying communities; weather and ice conditions that don't allow St. Lawrence Island hunters to hunt walruses at customary levels to fill the food stores; a confirmed outbreak of avian cholera in migratory birds, also at the island; and a continued occurrence of oiled seals and migratory birds showing up at St. Lawrence Island for the third year in succession.

According to Coast Guard numbers, the number of Bering Strait transits has doubled from 220 in 2008 to 440 in 2013. Despite those challenges, Bahnke said, there are also opportunities to be seized. She called for action and asked the leaders in the room to help co-author the next chapter in the history books as being active participants. "First people, People First" was the motto that guided the discussions.

With this motto in mind, the group began a two-day intense workshop to figure out what to do to address concerns connected with increased ship-

The complexity of the entire shipping issue was broken down into four sections: Safety and security; infrastructure; protection of natural resources and economic development.

Groups worked to identify problems, concerns and possible solutions, writing them on cards that were pinned to the wall. By the end of the two days, the walls of the Mini Convention Center sported writings organized under aforementioned headings.

The most pressing issue is safety and security. People felt that increases in ship traffic would translate into increases in pollution, noise pollution and a potential for accidents, oil spills and an invasion of new species.

The suggestion was made to turn the Bering Strait region into a no discharge zone; something the City of Nome supports at the IMO level as the International Maritime Organization currently hammers out the Polar Code.

Other suggestions included to request from the U.S. Coast Guard to ensure that certain zones are off-limits for ship traffic during peak hunting seasons.

One reoccurring theme was that communities would like to "see" the ships that are passing through. This sparked a discussion on the so-called AIS – short for Automatic Identification System. It is an automatic tracking system used on ships and vessel traffic services to identify and locate vessels, their course and speed.

The International Maritime Organization's International Convention for the Safety of Life at Sea (SOLAS) requires AIS to be fitted aboard international voyaging ships with gross tonnage of 300 or more, and all passenger ships regardless of size.

Although there are AIS base stations scattered throughout the Bering Strait, the system is only available if continued on page 6

For Nome, MAP agent Gay Sheffield managed to install an AIS at the Northwest Campus's building.

The Greek University of the Agean provided the equipment for free. This now enables Nome residents to click on marinetraffic.com, zoom into the Nome area and find ships that are currently in the vicinity of Nome. Since the system covers only line-of-sight, ships between Cape Nome, Nome and halfway to Sledge Island can be identified.

Institute of the North's Nils Andreassen facilitated the sessions dealing with economic development and infrastructure.

He addressed the group beginning with a provocative statement. He quoted a European academic who spoke at Alice Rogoff's "Arctic Circle" meeting in Iceland. "People of the Arctic did not create a changing climate, therefore they should not benefit. Indeed, it was a global sin, and the globe should benefit," was the quote that Andreassen repeated at last week's forum.

He did so to illustrate the attitude and perspective from other countries that are at the table shaping Arctic policies. Andreassen added that such a perspective should not have a place in the Arctic dialogue, but it is up to the region to formulate a clear strategy. He challenged the group of regional leaders to be very clear and consistent as they draft their message to the world of what is right, acceptable and wanted by the people of the Arctic. "The further you get away from the Arctic, the bigger it gets," he said. "So the message must reach near-Arctic nations such as China and India and beyond."

He said he has his voice and the choice how to spend his time and energy. "The people of this region have additional tools, as people who live here," he said. "Can you imagine an international shipping company getting a letter from the tribes of the region, who may not have the authority to force payments on those who travel through the Bering Strait, but whose combined voice can demand that company to subscribe to voluntary measures or invest in the local OSRO (oil spill response organization) to strengthen prevention and response training?"

Andreassen said there is strength in coalitions- for example by increasing regional coordination with the North Slope Borough and the Northwest Arctic Borough. He pointed to examples of successful coalitions in Finland and Canada. In Canada, tribes or native corporations enter "impact benefit agreements" with private companies who develop resources and they receive monetary compensation relative to the risk to their region.

In terms of Alaskan economic development, he said that most Arctic nations are equally endowed with mineral resources. In order to be successful developers, one needs a product, a market, a means to get the product to market, access to the resource and energy to develop it. "That's why we don't see more successful resource development projhe said. Exorbitant energy costs and the lack infrastructure are big hurdles to overcome. But there is hope. Andreassen quoted Melanie Bahnke's "owning the fleet" model. It is based on the theory to identifying a business that an outside company runs, then developing a similar model and eventually out-competing the outside company. Bahnke's analogy was to go from "riding in the back of the bus, to driving the bus to owning the bus and eventually owning the fleet of busses."

While there is a big need to develop infrastructure, Andreassen pointed to the need to develop a workforce that will be able to work those jobs. "To successfully operate in the region, the region needs more than ships and ports - it needs people, and more importantly, people with the right skills," he said. "To meet that obligation, northern regions must match technical experience with local and traditional knowledge, or combine the two- in this, the Arctic can achieve a marriage of cultures. Alaska can facilitate the development of competency and capability," Andreassen said.

Where is the training center for those Arctic jobs?

The group set to work and brainstormed ideas for infrastructure and economic development. Under infrastructure grew a list of recommendations: build light houses on Diomede, King Island and Wales; invest in own shipping vessels; have infrastructure to be able to handle accidents and an influx of large groups of people in case of shipping disaster; have infrastructure in place to deal with ships solid waste manage-

Under economic development the main points were to train community residents as first responders; get AIS system out to all communities; cater to eco-tourism and set up tour guides, outlets to sell Native arts and crafts; develop a local workforce to Melanie Bahnke closed the meeting and summarized the achievements, the biggest one being all in one room leading a focused discussion about the role Bering Strait citizens want to play in the grand scheme of things. "Thank you for helping with step one," Bahnke said.

"It's going to take hard work, but our region stands out because we are unified. We are not afraid to work together," she said.

IMO to adopt the Polar Code shipping regs in November

By Diana Haecker

The eyes of the industrialized world have begun to focus on the Arctic and the Bering Strait as natural resources once hidden under layers of ice surface due to receding summer sea ice.

Residents of the Bering Strait and northwest Alaska are becoming increasingly alarmed at what the increased interest, maritime traffic and resource development means to their subsistence way of life, their culture and the integrity of the northern environment.

Just last week, tribal and municipal leaders of the region met to begin the process of devising a plan that puts the residents of this region front and center (see related story starting

A pledge often heard during the meeting was to do one's best to learn more about the complexity of shipping-related issues. Besides the U.S. Coast Guard, state and federal policy makers, the regional group decided to become a player in the Arctic

But what is in place already to protect the land, water and air people depend on? And where can the local voices be effectively heard?

At the international level, the International Maritime Organization is the agency of the United Nations that is the global standard-setting authority for the safety, security and enviperformance ronmental international shipping.

The IMO's website says, "Its main role is to create a regulatory framework for the shipping industry that is fair and effective, universally adopted and universally implemented."

The IMO developed guidelines in the 1990s to address ships sailing in ice-covered waters in order to protect ships, the crew and harbors. Those guidelines, while they still apply are voluntary and the IMO did not address ships sailing in ice conditions of the polar regions. There were no rules in place dealing with ship equipment in low temperatures, the remote nature of the polar regions and the needs for additional Search And Rescue capabilities.

Commander John Mauger with the U.S. Coast Guard said that the USA, proposal to develop a mandatory Polar Code to address this. According to the IMO website, the organization is developing a mandatory International Code of safety for ships operating in polar water, to cover the full range of design, construction, equipment, operational, training, search and rescue and environmental protection matters relevant to ships operating in the inhospitable waters surrounding the two poles.

In May 2014, the Maritime Safety Committee approved, for consideration with a view to adoption at its November 2014 session, the draft new SOLAS chapter XIV "Safety measures for ships operating in polar waters", which would make mandatory the Introduction and part I-A of the International Code for Ships Operating in Polar Waters.

This Polar Code addresses polar water operational manuals, ship structure, ship stability, requirements on machinery, operational safety, fire safety, safety of navigation, communications, crew training and certifications and voyage planning.

The second part of the document spells out pollution prevention measures, including prevention of oil spills, noxious liquid substances, sewage and garbage.

The Polar Code would be an amendment to the International Convention on Safety of Life at Sea, or SOLAS, a regime that has been in existence since 1974

Cmdr. Mauger said the Polar Code was to be drafted in two phases, one phase that does not create new regulation because they already exist for large vessels such as tankers and cargo ships over 500 gross tons, and passenger ships carrying more than Mauger said the first phase is nearly finished and he expects that by November, the IMO will adopt the Polar Code. Phase 2 is to begin, which will see a bigger emphasis on what this region is concerned with.

"Since 2010 we [USCG] held more than eight public meetings, received letters, met directly with tribes, the North Slope Borough, to understand the issues and to incorporate examples in the Polar Code," Cmdr. Mauger said. Food security is Canada and Norway submitted the on the top of the list of concerns. Mandatory requirements in SOLAS include the avoidance of cetacean known areas. However, there are only voluntary guidelines to avoid areas other marine mammals use. All that is in the recommendatory section of the Polar Code, but Cmdr. Mauger said that it is vital that the information is presented to the shippers.

Cmdr. Mauger said in his experience, shipping companies are interested in the efficiency of their operations. "They want to get in and out of the terminal fast," he said. To facilitate smooth and uneventful voyages, Mauger said, owners and operators of ships will take into account any additional information they can get. Just getting local Bering Strait regional knowledge to shippers that originate in different countries might be the challenge.

The Polar Code is not a one-stop solution for this. For example, traffic routing and traffic separation schemes are very important, but they are not in the Polar Code.

A NOAA publication called Coast Pilot offers detailed descriptions on weather conditions, navigational hazards and other vital information for marine pilots. Another avenue to get information to shippers is through the just formed Arctic Waterways Safety Committee. "That is a powerful tool," Mauger said.

Tugs and barges for example are not included in the safety standards included in the Polar Code.

They are covered in Coast Guard regulations, but compliance of the tug and barge traffic in Western Alaska, as well as tankers and vessels carrying oil as a secondary cargo, is facilitated by a special program called the Alaska Maritime Prevention and Response Network. It is a service offered by the Alaska Marine Exchange, which also maintains and operates Automatic Identification System equipment along the Alaska coast to track vessels.

Ed Page with the Marine Exchange explained that the oil spill response equipment requirements prescribed in the Coast Guard regulations cannot feasibly be achieved throughout Alaska's the expansive maritime region. "The cargo industry would never be able to fund all the Coast Guard's oil spill response requirements in western and northwestern Alaska," said Page.

tain and he offers a way out by offering a service that 1,700 vessels plowing Alaskan waters already subscribe

"For years, the Coast Guard had regulations regarding tankers but just last year they realized that most spills happen with cargo ships, like the Selendang Ayu," Page told the Nugget.

The Coast Guard allows for a socalled Alternative Planning Criteria, APC for short, that achieves environmental protection objectives of the regulations through other measures. Such measures include 24/7 AIS vessel tracking that includes a person standing watch and detecting disabled vessels or detecting vessels sailing too close to shore. They also stand by to locate vessels capable of providing assistance, if need be. The network has a satellite tracking network that tracks towing vessels that may provide assistance to disabled vessels and prevent a grounding and potential total loss of vessel and crew, cargo and oil spill. Page said, if the Selendang Ayu would've been part of his network, they would have immediately detected that the vessel was disabled, drifting and the network could have prevented the tragic loss of life, the grounding and subsequent oil spill.

The network also offers expanded oil pollution prevention equipment capabilities, emergency towing systems, oil containment boom, oil skimmers and temporary storage containers.

Since January 2014, the Alaska Maritime Prevention and Response Network is the only Coast Guard-approved APC for nontank vessels operating in Western Alaska from Cordova to Kaktovik, Page said.

However, vessels on so-called innocent passage from foreign port to foreign port don't have to be part of the network and Page's network protect the larger vessel traffic, regional concern lies with Alaska Native hunters on the water. Page called the situation in the Bering Strait and increased shipping schemes a "manageable threat." What does he mean by that?

While the IMO, the Polar Code

"There is always the threat of an accident but we can manage it." he said. "If we see a vessel broke down, we can get help to it before the oil spill occurs." Largely due to advances in technology, Page feels threats can be minimized. He likened to getting into the car and driving in traffic. "You manage the threat of an accident by buckling up your seat belt, having good tires and driving at a reasonable speed," he said.

Page said he is testing smaller AIS trackers in Savoonga and Gambell with hunters using smaller vessels. "Smaller boats are not required by law to have AIS on board," he said.

He added that technology is available to use smaller trackers, a VHF radio and a monitor on a smaller boat so that they can be seen by other marine traffic and the home base and also that they can see the larger ves-

NWC science building nearly finished

By Sarah Miller

This week nears the completion of the renovation of the Northwest Campus' science building. One of the oldest buildings on campus, it was used originally for home economics and later became the science building because of its linoleum The newly renovated flooring. space will feature a lab with specialized research equipment including tables, sinks, lights, a centrifuge, fume hood, and digital recording equipment. In addition to the expanded lab space, classrooms will also be available for instruction and group presentations. Financing for the project came from the USDE Title 3 program, which provides federal funding for higher education institutions serving minorities including Alaska Natives and Native Hawaiians.

Northwest Campus currently offers programs to students and community members in the Norton Sound area on issues of local significance, which will benefit from the new science building and equipment. The Marine Advisory Program offers outreach and technical assistance to residents that promotes economic development of local commercial marine and freshwater industries while seeking to protect the environmental health and conservation of these natural resources. A component of the marine advisory program includes hands-on biology research that can be performed in the new lab. The High Latitude Reindeer Management Program (HLRM) offers instruction in managing reindeer herds with respect to the sustainability of the practice and its ecological impact. This program is one of only a few such programs in the world, with the others located in Scandinavian countries, and it shares one of its instructors with a program in Finland. "This program will have potentially the most use for the new building," said college director Bob Metcalf. "With two instructors, they'll be using the lab for biological sampling, blood testing, necropsies and other research related to reindeer herding."

The new lab will support expansion of the college's new nursing program, which allows students to complete their degree here in Nome within two years, as well as the other health career programs currently available. The lab will be available to students as they pursue scientific studies related to these careers, such as microbiology, health and disease, and anatomy and physiology. Through its Cooperative Extension Service, the college also offers programs to the community on a variety of topics, which can be enhanced with the new lab and Most imporclassroom space. tantly, the new building will support the college's goal of community outreach and education. NWC already includes an ongoing calendar of science lectures and presentations on local science topics and issues, but the lab will expand opportunities for community members to observe biology research in action. Ongoing projects will be accessible for observation to interested residents. "We want to encourage science, to grow our own scientists here in Nome, even if it is just civilian science observers. Not everyone needs to be a research scientist to be interested in all of the science opportunities we have here," said Metcalf. "We've only begun to scratch the surface of potential for science outreach in the Bering Straits re-

The new space may also provide a veanue for an increase in science research occurring close to home, noted Carol Gales, Program Development Manager. As climate change begins to impact the region in more concrete ways, with effects on wildlife, coastal erosion, and even subsistence practices in Alaskan villages, the attention of scientists and policy makers is increasingly focused on the Arctic region. Not only that, other research topics that are interrelated to ecology and biology have generated a surge of interest in Northwestern Alaska. These issues include the harvesting of minerals and oil, the potential for geothermal energy sources, and the exploration of Northwest passages that could cause increased transportation in the Arctic region are drawing the attention of researchers. Metcalf hopes the new building will enhance and benefit the research studies done by outside groups. "We wanted a space where researchers from elsewhere would have access to lab equipment and facilities while they are here. There's no facility like it anywhere around." Space in the lab can be leased to outside research groups during the summer, such as the Korean Polar Research Institute, which undertook studies in the Council area this summer on bacteria in the subarctic tundra soil. The college also hopes to accommodate research groups connected to UAF, including the Institute of Arctic Biology as well as Sikuliak, an ice breaking research vessel that is one of the most advanced research vessels in the world and is operated by UAF.

Amarok is now Dr. Barb Amarok!

By Nancy Mendenhall

On September 15, the University of Alaska Fairbanks awarded a PhD in Indigenous Studies to Nome's Barb Amarok.

Her 32 years of work and leadership in the region's education programs, starting with Kawerak ABE, then 20 years with Nome Public Schools, and recently six years with Northwest Campus, along with many education-focused boards and committees, led her to her dissertation topic: "An Indigenous Vision of 21st Century Education in the Bering Strait Region."

"I've always valued formal education," Amarok said." My father was an educator, and so was my mother's sister." Since their time, public education has improved much in the region, but more still needs to be done to help the youth. She gives specific examples. "I would like to see the Alaska Dept. of Education and the University of Alaska expand the number of courses required for teacher certification that specifically address the needs of rural Alaska Native children. There were two projects like that this year that I worked on: Sitnasuak sponsored a summer intensive reading program for elementary students, and NPS held a well-received in-service for all teachers, 'Cultural Sensitivity Training' with Mary Miller, Vera Metcalf, and Marilyn Koezuna-Irelan as the leaders."

The best parts of the PhD program for Amarok were, "My access to scholarly writings of people of color from around the world. And the support I got from being able to meet with a number of Alaska Native advanced degree-seeking students and to share insights from our projects."

Except for the last year she was also working fulltime. She says what kept her going in the rigorous program was her determination to serve the community and help students to be more successful. "And I had colleagues in Nome I could discuss issues with at any time," she said.

The formal awarding of degrees will be May 2015.

Troopers arrest five suspects in Shishmaref drug burglary

By Sandra L. Medearis

A yen for drugs and breaking laws to illegally possess them has resulted in two 18-year-old Shishmaref youths drawing multiple felony charges after they broke into their village clinic.

Troopers took the pair to Anvil Mountain Correctional Center pending arraignment. Three 15-year-olds also involved have been taken to Nome Youth Facility and their cases handed over to Dept. of Juvenile Justice for juvenile charges.

As of Monday, the court had released Ned Ahgupuk, 18, to third party custodians Irene Ahgupuk and Diane Merrill. As of Monday, Ryan Paul Nayokpuk, 18, remained in custody at Anvil Mountain Correctional Center.

According to charging documents filed by Alaska State Trooper Timothy Smith, he received a report from Shishmaref VPSO Eningowuk that early Sept. 12, suspects broke a window and entered the Norton Sound Health Corp. community clinic. Inside, they pried open another door leading to the medication room. There, they pried open a locker used to secure narcotics.

Village health aides found 101 Tylenol 3 tablets containing codeine missing along with five syringes of morphine, troopers said.

The burglars used tools they stole earlier in the morning from Shishmaref 's school.

Trooper investigation found that Ned Ahgupuk and the three juveniles had pried the door to the clinic with a butter knife. When the door opened, it quickly closed. The four went to the school to find a tool to use in the break-in. When the young men got to the school, they ran into Ryan Paul Nayokpuk who was drawing on a piece of wood.

One of the juveniles stood outside the school with Nayokpuk while Ahgupuk and two juveniles went into the school via an open window. The three came out of the school with propane torches and a crowbar. Nayokpuk remained at the school while the three juveniles and Ahgupuk walked back to the clinic and gained access by breaking a window with the crowbar.

The four came out of the clinic and walked with Nayokpuk to a nearby shop, according to trooper reports, and did "lines" of crushed Tylenol 3 tablets.

According to the other boys, Nayokpuk took the crowbar with the intention of throwing it away.

The propane torches have been recovered, but not the crowbar. Ahgupuk and the three juveniles admitted burglarizing the school and the clinic, troopers said in the report. Ahgupuk returned a bag of Tylenol

3 tablets and one morphine syringe.

[Nayokpuk admitted to consuming Tylenol 3 pills but did not return any of the drugs to me," Smith said in his report. "Two of the morphine syringes and a majority of the Tylenol 3 pills remain unaccounted for."

State law lists Tylenol 3, which contains codeine, and morphine as controlled substances.

Nayokpuk has been charged on Misconduct Involving A Controlled Substance in the Fourth Degree, Burglary in the Second Degree for the clinic break-in, both Class C felonies, and Theft in the Fourth Degree.

Ahgupuk has been charged on two counts of Burglary in the Second Degree, both Class C felonies, for the clinic and school, as well as Misconduct Involving A Controlled Substance, a Class C Felony and two counts of Theft in the Fourth Degree for stealing from the school and the clinic. H also faces a charge on Criminal Mischief in the Third Degree for damage to the clinic estimated to exceed $2,000.

Troopers are continuing to investigate the whereabouts of the remaining Tylenol 3 and morphine.

Residents of Shishmaref are worried for their children because of the dangerous nature of the opioids, according to Smith's affidavit filed in District Superior Court in Nome.

Lawsuit challenging the Walker-Mallott ticket without foundation

This opinion piece by former Attorney General Bruce Botelho and Lieutenant Governor Stephen McAlpine, participants in the Walker Mallott, merger is being distributed statewide.

On September 17, attorney and Republican Party activist Ken Jacobus went to court on behalf of the Republican Party's district chair, Steve Strait, in an attempt to remove Parnell's only significant opposition from the ballot. Mr. Jacobus' theory is that Lieutenant Governor Mead Treadwell could not adopt emergency regulations to permit Bill Walker to substitute Byron Mallott as his running mate. Jacobus has demanded that the court bar Mr. Walker and Mr. Mallott from appearing "as a combined non-party ticket". In our judgment, this lawsuit has no merit.

The scenario complained about in this current lawsuit has actually occurred on five separate occasions. In four of those instances (1982, 2002, 2006, and now in 2014) emergency regulations were adopted to provide the means to allow a gubernatorial candidate to select a new running mate. While elements of this merged ticket are certainly worthy of the "history-inthe-making" banner, the mechanics of the merger are nothing new or out of the ordinary in this state. In 2006, the attorney general reviewed the constitutional and other legal precedent and concluded:

"[W]e think that no-party gubernatorial candidates are free to choose any running mate they wish, regardless of political affiliation or lack thereof, whether it be at the initial petition stage or later when the original running mate may withdraw and need to be replaced."

Mr. Jacobus' complaint reads like the partisan press release that it is, attempting to portray the merger of the two campaigns as a cynical backroom deal orchestrated by union bosses. As eyewitnesses and participants in the discussions leading up to the merger, let us be perfectly clear-no offers of appointment, employment, or passing or vetoing legislation, or commitments of public funding were made. And despite all of the speculation, both Bill and Byron stood resolute in their personal convictions on certain issues but agreed that they were in alignment on the vast array of issues critical to them as Alaskans.

Yes, Bill and Byron talked privately about a possible merger of their campaigns. Each campaign had been following several polls over the course of the spring and summer showing that (a) Governor Parnell's performance in office was largely discredited, and that (b) more Alaskans than not wanted a new governor which they would not get in a 3-way race. Bill and Byron recognized that they shared similar views on most of the pressing issues facing Alaska and that the state could not easily sustain four more years of extremism and mismanagement that characterizes the current administration. Their common vision is what led them to make common cause.

Bill and Byron were well aware of the AFL-CIO's preference for a combined ticket. But well before that, there were voices throughout Alaska, in the business and medical community, among tribal leadership, from pro-life supporters and women's organizations, conservatives and liberals, local government leaders, fishermen, hunters, farmers, families and students, who urged consolidation for the same reasons that brought Bill and Byron to-

We should not be surprised by this lawsuit. The latest polls show that Alaskans strongly prefer the Walker-Mallott ticket over the Parnell-Sullivan ticket. We are bemused by the irony that Republican Party operatives now believe they must rise to the defense of the Democratic Party.

We express our support for the integrity and competence of the attorneys representing our government in this case and our confidence that the court will uphold the actions of Lt. Governor Treadwell to permit Bill Walker and Byron Mallott to appear together on the November ballot. We deplore the efforts of Mr. Jacobus and Mr. Strait to deprive the voters of Alaska of a choice between the failed policies and actions of the Parnell administration and the opportunity for a new beginning that the Walker-Mallott team offers our conferences at the Kegoayah Kozga library arranged by Marguerite LaRiviere. The first one was about tropical rain forests and the second one was about the seasons and what causes them to change. The conferences were made possible by OWL, Online With Libraries.

Homeschoolers Take Virtual Field Trips in the Kegoayah Kozga Library These past two Fridays, Nome homeschoolers participated in video

Tropical Rainforests was the topic of the first video conference. Taught by the Center for Puppetry Arts, this class discussed animals in the rain forests and layers of the rain forest. Throughout the program, the director instructed the students in creating a rod-manipulated tropical bird puppet. This was a great science and arts lesson all in one.

During the 60 minute Seasons e-lab, homeschool teams Alpha, Bravo, Charlie, and Delta reviewed the key topics in an interactive way with the lab director. Using a Seasons simulator, they predicted the seasons of Athens, Greece; Auckland, New Zealand; and Quito, Ecuador.

Through funds provided to the library, homeschoolers were able to take virtual field trips like these. It benefits students by connecting them with international award-winning programs.

Nanooks gain valuable experience at the West Spiketacular volleyball tournament

By Keith Conger

The Nome-Beltz Nanooks volleyball team did not fly to Anchorage last weekend thinking they were going to make history by claiming the title at the West Spiketacular volleyball tournament. They were, after all, one of only three small 3A schools competing against 18 much larger 4A schools.

They had to look no further than the tournament champions — the Dimond Lynx — to see that they were up for a huge challenge. The 4A Lynx have a roster with three sixfoot girls. Nine of their 12 players are either as tall as, or taller than Nome's tallest player.

"Most of the teams just pounded the ball at us for our lack of height, " said Nanooks coach Lucas Frost.

By traveling to this high caliber convergence of 4A volleyball powers, the Nanooks did have the opportunity to learn lots. Frost said, "the best place to gain experience is a big tourney like this. It's a safe place to try new things.'

On Friday night the Nanooks opened pool play and were thrown off stride by both the Soldotna Stars and then the East High Thunderbirds. They were outscored 20 - 10 in the first game, and 20 - 9 in each of the next three.

The Spiketacular allows the maximum amount of exposure to other teams by shortening games to 20 points, whereas, traditional games are played to 25 points. Matches are also shortened to two games, differing from the maximum of five in regular contests.

The Nome girls, however, began pounding back a bit later in the evening, and their players started to click in the second game of their match against the Eagle River Wolves. In that game they scored 15

The Nanooks had their best result of the weekend during their final match on Friday night. The team nearly stole the second contest against the Wasilla Warriors. By establishing their highest point total, they were able to extend the game into overtime, finishing at 22 - 20.

"Rayne (Lie) had our longest serving string of the tournament." said Frost. "She got us back in the game against Wasilla."

On Saturday morning, the Nanooks continued their streak of improving during the second games of matches. They scored 17 points against the Lathrop Malemutes. Later they again scored 17 points, this time against the host West High Eagles, a team that ended up tied for first after the initial rounds of play.

'One of our biggest challenges is serve receive," said Frost. "We are working on that." The Nanooks' coach said that he was surprised at the number of teams at the tournament that were intentionally serving the ball short. Frost explained, that instead of having 15 to 20 feet to make a pass off the serve, the girls were forced to make tight passes 5 to 8 feet from the net.

"We have the best setters in our region (in Renee Merchant and Jayden Otten)," explained Frost. "Now we are working on getting the ball cleanly to them

The Nome girls drew a familiar regional foe in the Barrow Whalers for single elimination bracket play on Saturday afternoon. The Whalers would down the Nanooks 25 - 13, and 25 - 17.

The Nanooks and Whalers, who have both lost to Kotzebue this year, are used to playing 3A opponents that are much smaller. In these matches finesse is as important as power. Frost thinks that when Western Region teams meet throughout the season the ones that are most confident in digging and defense will be the most successful.

Frost reported that all-tournament selectee senior Renee Merchant led the team over the weekend. Frost added, "Jane Tidwell was pretty awesome at the net. She had lots of heads-up play.'

Frost says that there are hidden benefits to attending tournaments with 4A teams. He explained that there is great value in watching high caliber squads. The Nome girls can set new goals for themselves after seeing teams like Anchorage South and Dimond High.

The Nanooks' educational volleyball experience in Anchorage was concluded with them attending a University of Alaska – Anchorage Seawolves volleyball match.

The team will be hosting the girls from Kotzebue for two matches this weekend, September 26 and 27.

Welcome from the Faculty and Staff of the Bering Strait School District (BSSD)

By Brett Agenbroad

Believe it or not we are approaching the mid-point of first quarter already! BSSD has had a great start to the 2014-2015 school year. We are in the process of implementing our new Cengage National Geographic Reading, English Language Arts (ELA) program that aligns with the Alaska English Language Arts Standards.

This year we will audit the district's current math program to ascertain how well the math curriculum aligns with the new Alaska State Standards. It is essential that we provide every opportunity for BSSD students to increase basic understanding and reinforce math fundamentals. We have implemented Daily Math Skills (DMS) district-wide in grades K-8 this year as means of daily practice of reviewing and reinforcing mathematics fundamentals.

During our all-staff in-service in August, the entire BSSD faculty was trained in the proper implementation of the Cengage Reading Curriculum. Faculty is taking the initial weeks of this school year to familiarize students with the routines and procedures essential to the success of the new reading curriculum. On October 1-3, BSSD faculty will reassemble for further training on implementing the reading program. Administrative leadership and instructional teams spent considerable time and effort last year analyzing student achievement data and agreeing on uniform interpretations of data in an effort to make accurate, data-driven decisions regarding prescriptive interventions in student learning.

Through our focused efforts, district attendance rates rose significantly in FY14 at 73% of our school sites. The FY14 ASPI star designations increased as well, with nine of our sites being rated as 3-star schools or above. We reduced the number of one-star schools from four in FY13 to a single school site in FY14.

Currently, reading and math proficiency across the curriculum is the primary focus within the district. An analysis of district performance across the state on the Standards Based Assessment Test (SBA), identifies BSSD as having 50% of students reading at grade level proficiency last year. It is the goal of the district leadership to increase student reading proficiency rates to no less than 76% proficient in third grade over the next three years. It is well documented that a student who is not reading at grade level by the end of third grade is at a higher statistical probability of dropping out of school, incurring a criminal record, abusing substances, and is relegated to lower socioeconomic tax brackets than functional readers.

This year, math review is the primary focus area within the BSSD due to the fact that the math proficiency rate of the district over the past ten years has averaged below 50% proficiency. It is the goal of district leadership to bring student proficiency levels in math to no less than 80% by FY19.

We have a significant focus on cultural relevance as the tool to engage our students and build connections to the academic content across the curriculum.

began intensive training of our bicultural staff, instructional paraprofessionals and elementary and secondary faculty together in cultural relevance and best teaching practices; this year the focus will be on the integration of state cultural standards into instruction rich in cultural relevance and application.

Please help us in welcoming the BSSD's faculty and staff as you have the opportunity, they are all strongly focused on measurable student growth and sustained increases in student learning across the curriculum.

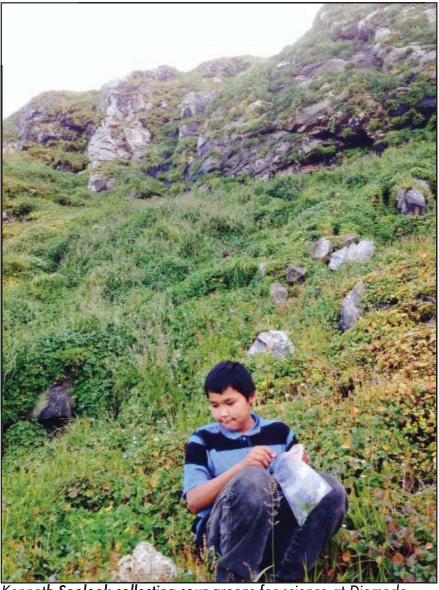

Wishing everyone in the region a safe and effective school year.

More than half of Alaska's invasive species have inhabited Alaska since statehood.

Finding the Boat

By: Payton Commack Unalakleet

I found this little sailboat while I was on a nature walk with my Bilingual group a few weeks ago. I found it on the beach over by Era or Ravn, whichever you call it. I was looking on the ground for coal or any type of bone, and then I saw a piece of leather with a stick through it. I picked it up and figured out that it was a boat! Then, my friend EJ found that there was a phone number on the sail.

Students standing at the location the boat was found.

A name and phone # was found written on the front of the boat.

The back of the boat.

Once we got back to our Bilingual classroom, we called the number. When they answered we asked them if they had set out a boat. They said, "Yes!" then EJ told them, "We found it!" We asked them where they were from and found out that they are from Port Heiden in southwestern Alaska. They told us that they only have 90-something people in their village. The people who set the boat out were an Aleut couple and they just wanted to see how far the boat would go, and it came all the way to Unalakleet. Anyway, that is how we found the boat.

Connecting the Dots

By: Keith Carroll Gambell

Apaay Campbell and Spencer Fackler are Pre Calculus students in Mr. Keith Carroll's Class at John Apangalook School in Gambell. They are discovering recursive and explicit formulas in sequences. They looked at the problem of how many handshakes it would take x people to shake hands with each other once. Apaay and Spenser made models with dots to represent each person, and then connected the dots to represent handshakes. After a few models  $\{[I,O], \{2,1\}, \{3,3\}, \{4,6\}, \{5,10\}\},$  they were able to discover the recursive formula Un =  $\{Un - 1 + \{n-1\}\}$ . So three people shake hands =  $U3 = Un - 1 + \{n-1\}$  =  $U2 + \{3-1\} = 2 + 1 = 3$ . Then they discovered the explicit formula, which was more difficult to find.

Apaay and Spencer's work connecting the dots.

Apaay and Spencer used the fact that a circle has 360 degrees to evenly space the dots around the circumference. The two models pictured represent 15 people (105 hand shakes) and 20 people (190 hand shakes).

GRAND OPENING: Brevig Mission Bicultural Classroom

Brevig students gather at the grand opening of he new bilingual classroom.

By Angela Busch Alston

Thanks to funds provided by Norton Sound Economic Development Corporation, Brevig Mission School was able to transform an old ski shed into a new bicultural classroom.

On Friday, September 5, 2014 students, staff, community members, and NSEDC board member Lillian Olanna gathered together to celebrate and tour the classroom. Principal Ginger Crockett and bicultural instructor Randall Jones gave short speeches before cutting a ribbon draped across the outside of the classroom. The crowd applauded and cake was served.

The classroom will house Brevig Mission School's bilingual and bicultural program. Students will learn carving, sewing, and Inupiaq language.

Brevig Mission School is grateful to NSEDC for the money to complete the project, Lillan Olanna for her role in securing funds, John Lycan for the hours he spent working on the classroom, and Randall Jones for writing the original grant.

Hares started colony on Little Diomede

By Diana Haecker

Kevin Ozenna did not expect to see a hare hopping over the plateau of Little Diomede when he went bird hunting there last week. Ozenna shot the hare and brought it home for supper. "This is the second one I got in five months," Ozenna said. "We found out they make good stew."

In more recent memory, Little Diomede residents have not customarily seen hares on the island. But several generations ago, the animals were seen there. Elders like Orville Ahkinga remember their elders talking about hares. He remembered a boy catching a hare in 1970, but it wasn't a regular occurrence. "When I grew up there, there weren't any, but the elders talked about hares and foxes crossing back and forth between Big Diomede and Little Diomede," Ahkinga said.

That is something that makes a whole lot of sense to Link Olson, the Curator of Mammals at the University of Alaska Museum at UAF in Fairbanks, who studies the species and has an Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game grant to study the genetics of the Alaska hare to determine the genetic health of the species. Olson is intrigued with the hares found on Little Diomede and hopes they offer a piece of the puzzle he's trying to solve.

Three species

There are three different species, he explains. There is the Alaska hare (Lepus othus), which is only found in western Alaska from the Seward Peninsula south to the Alaska Peninsula. It is locally known as the "jackrabbit" or "Arctic hare" but scientists call it Alaska hare. The Arctic hare (Lepus arcticus) is found throughout much of northern Canada but does not quite get as far west as Alaska. The Mountain hare (Lepus timidus) is found throughout most of northern Eurasia.

The question is if those Diomede hares are of Eurasian or Alaskan origin. "It has become increasingly clear that we can't study just the Alaska hare in isolation," said Olson. Olson thinks it's plausible that individual hares or even groups cross back and forth between the Seward and Chukotsk peninsulas. "I'd be very surprised, in light of the Diomedes hares, if this were not the case. Whether it happens often enough to prevent the accumulation of distinctive genetic mutations in Mountain or Alaska hares is the question we need to ask." But samples from the Chukotsk Peninsula are hard to get, in part due to political frictions between Russia and the USA.

Genetics

Olson said that scientists can't differentiate the three species based on any aspect of their anatomy. "If you were to give me or anyone else one specimen of each, whether it was a skull, skeleton, skin, or even the entire intact animal, we would not be able to tell which of the three species any of them were unless you told me where you had gotten them," Olson said. Some scientists have questioned whether there are really three or only two species. The answer remains elusive, even genetics can't offer conclusive evidence.

Olson said hares are notorious for interbreeding with other hare species, which means the DNA from one species can find its way into the other species.

"Even if they are three different species, they split off from their common ancestor relatively recently, so none of them have accumulated many distinctive genetic mutations," Olson explained.

"Previous studies have only looked at a small number of genes," he continued. "Even if all three species have evolved into what we call 'reproductively isolated' species, it can still take a long time for those diagnostic mutations to evolve and become 'fixed' in a population. In such cases, you can't look at evidence from just one, two, or even ten genes. You need to look at hundreds, thousands, or possibly tens of thousands of genetic markers."

Olson also said that hares are unknown on St. Lawrence Island, but he heard of eyewitness accounts of a large hare matching the description of an Alaska or Mountain hare on the island three winters ago. "We would be very interested in obtaining samples from any hares from St. Lawrence. We would also be interested in just about any reports of large numbers of hares or interesting or unusual behavior anywhere," he said.

"We'd like to come to the Nome area next spring to radiocollar some hares to see how far they travel."

Kevin Ozenna said that other people on Little Diomede have also seen and hunted the animals on top of the island. He describes the animals as big, healthy looking and coming in a variety of colors from white to grey to dark brown. He doesn't remember exactly when they showed up, but he recalled it was sometime last winter. At first they hung around the edge of the island and then they moved up to the top of the island in the summer. "We see them all the time now," he said.

Public floods EPA with support for protection of Bristol Bay from mining

Over 1.5 million comments oppose Pebble Mine, support protection of world's largest wild salmon fishery

Dillingham, AK/Washington D.C. - The U.S. Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) received approximately 700,000 comments in support of its plan to use its Clean Water Act authority to restrict mine waste disposal from the Pebble Mine proposed in Alaska's Bristol Bay watershed. When combined with previous public input, over 1.5 million comments have been submitted in favor of Bristol Bay protection, including broad and diverse support from Alaska Native Tribes, commercial fishermen, hunters and anglers, businesses like CREDO Mobile, churches, conservation groups, restaurants, jewelers and investors.

"Our economy and culture are on the line," said Luki Akelkok, chairman of Nunamta Aulukestai, an association of ten Bristol Bay Native Tribes and corporations and a sportfishing lodge owner. "We want the EPA to finalize these restrictions as quickly as possible to protect our salmon and our livelihoods."

Bristol Bay is home to the world's largest and most productive wild salmon fishery. Alaska Native Tribes and commercial fishermen petitioned the EPA in 2010 to use its authority under Section 404(c) of the Clean Water Act to restrict mine waste disposal from the proposed Pebble Mine to protect the salmon fishery. The EPA's plan, which was released for public comment in July 2014, found that even the smallest Pebble mine scenario would have significant, unacceptable impacts on salmon.

"We asked the EPA to step in to protect our salmon fishery, and they listened to us," said Kim Williams, executive director of Nunamta Aulukestai. "Local, state and national support for protecting Bristol Bay is undeniable. Now they just have to finish the job."

According to EPA records, the loss of streams and wetlands from development of the Pebble deposit would be unprecedented for the Section 404 regulatory program of the Clean Water Act in Alaska and the nation. The Bristol Bay salmon fishery generates $480 million in annual revenue, and supplies almost half of the world's wild sockeye salmon.

With over 1.5 million comments in favor of Bristol Bay protection, there can be no doubt that the public supports this," said Jennifer Krill, executive director of Earthworks. "All eyes are on the Obama Administration now to make the final call that protects the world's most valuable wild salmon fishery, and the 14,000 jobs that rely on it.

EPA will decide whether to withdraw its plan or recommend its finalization no later than February 4th,

Fishermen celebrate united support for Clean Water Act protections in Bristol Bay; "big thanks" to the commercial fishing industry nationwide

The public comment period on EPA's proposal to protect the Bristol Bay watershed from the proposed Pebble Mine closed Friday, September 19; Americans sent a strong message supporting Bristol Bay's irreplaceable salmon fishery and the thousands of jobs it provides for.

DILLINGHAM, AK – Bristol Bay, Alaska's sockeye salmon runs support over 2,800 family fishing operations, and 14,000 jobs nationwide.

As those fishermen wrapped up their 2014 season with a sustainable harvest of 28 million salmon, they were given something more to celebrate. The 60-day public comment period for the Environmental Protection Agency's long-awaited proposal to protect their fishery from large-scale open-pit mining concluded on Friday with initial public comment counts demonstrating overwhelming support.

Preliminary counts of support show that over 625,000 public comments, including Bristol Bay's fishermen, processors, Alaska's fishing industry and commercial fishing groups and businesses across the nation, all weighed in supporting EPA protections for Bristol Bay. Alaskans alone sent roughly 20,000 comments supporting the proposed protections.

Sue Aspelund, a spokeswoman for the fishing fleet, was pleased that so many concerned citizens spoke up. "A massive open-pit mine planned for the heart of the salmon-rearing headwaters of our nation's largest and most valuable salmon runs is not worth the risk. And based on these numbers, the American people clearly agree," said Aspelund, executive director of the Bristol Bay Regional Seafood Development Association.

Although official numbers will be released later, a clear majority support the Clean Water Act process known as Section 404(c), which allows EPA to proactively restrict certain dredge and fill permits required in order for Pebble to move forward. During the multi-year effort to implement protections for the Bristol Bay fishery, some 1.5 million comments were received in support of strong protections for Bristol Bay from large-scale mining within the region.

"Now that we have these estimates and the latest public comment period is closed, we are doing two things," said Aspelund. "We're sending out a big thanks to everyone who commented to the EPA during this process, and we're asking the agency and the Administration to move as quickly as possible to implement strong protections for the thousands of people who depend on Bristol Bay salmon for their income and way of life. We want to ensure our fishermen can continue their businesses without this threat hanging over them."

A mine disaster in British Columbia's Fraser River watershed that occurred during the 60-day comment period focused renewed public attention on the potential risks of the proposed open-pit Pebble development at the headwaters of Bristol Bay's two most-productive salmon rearing river systems.

'The failure of the Mount Polley Mine tailings dam, which ironically took place during this public comment period, provided a tragic preview of what could happen in our watershed if this type of mining were permitted," said Katherine Carscallen, Bristol Bay commercial fisherman and Sustainability Director for the BBRSDA. "For a decade, Pebble's proponents have been making empty promises and guarantees to Bristol Bay and our fishermen. The tragedy at Mount Polley graphically illustrates

Opinion:

President Obama's plan to arm unknown Syrian rebels is flawed

By U.S. Senator Mark Begich

When it comes to President Obama's flawed plan to arm unknown Syrian rebels, the significant risks outweigh the potential rewards. It is not a coherent or successful strategy to keep our country safe, which is why I voted against the proposal.

Without question, the world is a dangerous place and ISIS is one of many serious threats facing the U.S. and our allies. We have seen evidence of this with the recent brutal beheadings of two American journalists and a British aid worker, as well as countless other atrocities in the region.

However, the President is wrong when it comes to arming unknown rebels in Syria. So I opposed the legislation eventually signed into law to fund President Obama's plan to train and arm Syrian rebels. And I believe Harry Reid was wrong to attach a government funding resolution to this legislation.

I support keeping the government running and am opposed to cynical political ploys that try to shut it down, but I could not support funding weapons for unknown Syrian rebels, without greater assurance the administration has the ability to adequately identify those we can trust. We must keep U.S. weapons out of the hands of our enemies.

Do not confuse my opposition to the President's plan, however, with the fact that I believe we need to act now. ISIS is a serious threat to the Middle East and to the United States, which is why I support aggressive air strikes and building an international coalition to combat ISIS.

In addition to aggressive U.S. air strikes, our known partners in the region need to step up to the plate and do their part. If combat troops are necessary, they must come from the countries of the region rightly opposed to the brutal extremism of ISIS. It is time for other countries to step up to plate.

I also believe we should be taking steps to undermine the economic vitality of these terrorist organizations by dismantling their oil fields and other resources which they exploit to fund and support their radical, violent agenda.

It appears Secretary of State John Kerry is making some inroads through outreach to neighboring countries in the region, but we must continue to build a robust and engaged international coalition of nations to lead the charge.

I am disappointed President Obama and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid refused to the do the right thing and separate these two vital issues so the Senate could address them individually on their merits.

Both funding our government and keeping our country safe are critically important. So with nearly two weeks until current funding expires, I believe Congress should have stayed in session to debate these issues separately.

We know from past experience in that region of the world that alliances are often unpredictable. There is a problematic history of our friends of today becoming our enemies tomorrow. We owe it to our service men and women to make sure we aren't providing arms that will only be used against U.S. soldiers in the future.

I object to more American boots on the ground and I see arming the rebels as a troubling potential step in that direction. Little over a month ago, President Obama himself said creating a credible force out of the Syrian rebels was a "fantasy."

Once we commit to arming and training forces on the ground, it will be become necessary to increase the American presence in attempt to manage a highly disorganized and unreliable effort.

Though some are quick to support President Obama's plan, I have always said we cannot afford another long ground war that drains our financial resources, especially at a time when we need to take care of our veterans, build critical infrastructure at home and invest in our economy.

As we rightfully proceed with airstrikes and forming a coalition, we owe it to the soldiers who have deployed over the past decade to Iraq and Afghanistan—many of them from Alaska, and many multiple times—to more closely examine this strategy to arm the Syrian rebels. Let us also not forget ISIS is one of many serious threats facing us, and we must remain vigilant on the overall war against terrorism.

Alaska has more veterans per capita than any other state and I cannot make any decision without considering them and their families. In the coming weeks, I look forward to a continued debate in Congress and to my conversations with Alaskans about how to keep America safe.

LUXURY MOTOR YACHT - The luxury motor yacht Latitude anchored in the Nome small boat harbor on September 20.

The Dock Walk

A September storm began pounding the ocean with a strong winds, but still warm temperatures. This caused two situations with gold dredges that were still out there in the pounding surf instead of joining the rest of the gold dredge fleet, hunkered down in the small boat harbor. One gold dredge lost a 55-gallon drum overboard filled with waste oil. Crew from another dredge called for help to be rescued as their skiff flooded.

Harbormaster Lucas Stotts reports that he received a call on Monday, Sept. 22 in the very early morning hours that three people working on the dredge Gold Fish were stranded at sea without power seven miles down West beach. The crew had climbed into their skiff, which got swamped by the waves but eventually the surf pushed the skiff into shore with them inside it. No injuries were reported.

Also, the same morning, Stotts received a report that there was an oil sheen on West Beach coming from the dredge Myrtle Irene. Investigation revealed that one 55-gal. drum of waste oil was floating in the water with a slow leak and drifting toward the shore. Port staff as well as the vessel's owner were observing and watching the oil drum as it bobbed toward shore. Ocean conditions were too rough to recover the drum. The U.S. Coast Guard was notified.

Stotts reports the following traffic in and out of the harbor last week. On Sept. 16, Delta Western's tug and barge Paragon/DBL79 departed after delivering fuel. Crowley's tug and barge Pacific Raven/Kays Point delivered fuel. The sailing boat S/V Gitana arrived in Nome after sailing through the Northwest Passage. The tanker Themsestern anchored in Nome's roadstead. Crowley's tug and barge Sesok/165-1 delivered fuel to the small boat harbor.

The fishing vessels Egavik and the Paul C. Johnson docked at the NSEDC fish dock.

On Sept. 17, Delta Western's tug and barge Paragon/DBL79 arrived for a fuel delivery.

On Sept. 18, the Paragon is still at the docks. The sailing vessel S/V Novora arrived in Nome after sailing the Northwest Passage.

On Sept. 19, Delta Western and the Paragon/DBL79 departed. The sailing vessel S/V Arctic Turn arrived from the Northwest Passage. The sailing vessel Novora departed and headed south. The landing craft Devon arrived for village freight.

On Sept. 20, AML's landing craft Sam Taalak arrived and departed with village freight. The luxury motor yacht Latitude arrived from the Northwest Passage. The sailing vessel S/V Drina departed.

Fire Marshall investigating Umiaq Apartment fire

By Sandra L. Medearis

Flames ate up the homes of more than 20 people Thursday evening and defied about 27 firefighters with axes, chainsaws, a pump truck and a ladder truck trying to quell the fire for about three hours.

No occupants of the building received injury.

Two individuals did go to Norton Sound Regional Hospital for slight smoke inhalation.

In the end, the fire fighters won, but they did not get equipment put away and their vehicles home until after midnight.

Some personnel had to get back out of bed when the fire tried to flare up again at "o'dark thirty" Friday morning.

Spectators saw Nome Volunteer Fire Dept. watering the fire from both the front and the back of the building with hoses and a pump truck.

When the fire on one side showed signs of being controlled, flames would billow out of openings in the opposite side of the building.

The fire challenged the firefighters' regular and repeated Wednesday night trainings.

"For us to arrive on the scene and to see such a volume of fire and the rapid spread through the scene was unbelievable," Matt Johnson, a firefighter said. "The training we've had paid off a lot."

Firefighters got the call just before 7 p.m. when billowing smoke and flames broke out into view from the west end of the Umiaq Apartments at Third Avenue and Moore Street. Several apartments in the nine-unit complex were destroyed along with the personal belongings of several families. Another call came at 3:30 a.m. about a flare-up, which according to firefighters wasn't a "big deal," just some items smoking.

"There wasn't any place for the fire to go, and there were still seven inches of water in the building," Johnson said.

When fire on the east side of the building started fireworks in the building's power hookup, the department command called for Nome Joint Utility to cut the power to the building. NJUS employee Randy Gould went up in a cherry picker crane and did just that, snipping two direct lines to the building at the pole.

NJUS had to cut off one feeder to the area to get the power off ASAP.

As a result, power was interrupted to a larger part of town for about 15 minutes, according to John K. Handeland, utility manager.

Sunday, fire marshal staff from Anchorage investigated the origin of the blaze.

Information gleaned from Nome District Court suggests that prosecutors would file arson charges against a person or persons responsible for starting the blaze with five children in the building.

Matt Johnson, firefighter, left determining the cause of the blaze to the fire marshal's office. He said he continued on page 4

According to court documents, Allen had bitten Silicia's arm, causing pain and injury to her arm. Timm observed a red mark on Sicilia's arm consistent with teeth marks.

Allen was arraigned in Second Judicial District Court in Nome on Sept. 26 on a complaint of Assault in the Fourth Degree, a Class A misdemeanor offense.

Magistrate Judge Robert Lewis set bail at $2,000.

At the hospital, Allen blew a breath sample that registered .315 BrAC on an alcohol intoxication test. Allen has also been charged for a parole violation for use of alcohol.

Allen pleaded not guilty to assault and denied violating her probation.

Allen's next hearing is slated for Nov. 7.

Letters

Dear Nancy,

I wanted to do a follow up letter, when trooper Gonazles called. He left us the impression that our son's death would be looked into because he did not like trooper Stroebele's

Trooper Cross came and talked to my wife first; demonstrated how he put gun on floor leaned over and shot himself and that's how the gunshot was muffled, and he said the case was closed. We are not accepting trooper's theory, testing suicidal to his girlfriend and how he shot himself.

As for texting his girlfriend he was getting calls at the same time from her. I know he would want to answer his phone. About texting, I feel he did not text her, someone else did for him, that knew or went through it before, know what to say. Him and his girlfriend were good, ok, calling and talking to each other the night before. Nothing in the way was wrong. He was to set net before he would leave for college, do laundry and pack up to go U.A.A.

I asked to get it reopened and investigate. Questions still remain unanswered but did not get a straight answer to reopen case.

We believe he was not suicidal at all. All was good, OK with family and girlfriend. Getting ready to set net and prepare to leave for college. The whole scene is not right even with their theory, no way, no how. Not the way he was laid out, face down, arms stretched, bruises on face and buttock he never had, gun on side of wall, not besides him or under him.

We are blessed to have a son like him and thank to good Lord for giving him to us.

He is with the good Lord now. Thank you to those who still believe in us. Hopefully we can resolve this and move on with our lives. May God bless and keep you.

Sincerely, Allan J. and Sally V. Okpealuk Brevig Mission, AK 99785

The Importance of Being Prepared

Emergencies happen when we are not expecting them. The recent apartment fire that forced 20 people out of their homes and destroyed their personal belongings brings to mind the need to plan family fire drills. Last week several Nomeites who were visiting Anchorage got the jolt of a 6.2 earthquake and had to decide what to do wile their building was rocking and rolling.

In Nome we always have the danger of intense storms. Do we know what to take if we have to evacuate? Do we have emergency lighting? Medicines? Enough food? Do we know how to contact family? We also need to know that it is not macho to tempt the fates. We need to practice personal safety and on the job safety.

Something that can make us proud is the caring attitude of our town. Stores opened for food and clothing. Churches pitched in and hotels provided emergency shelter. Of course we are all grateful for the heroic efforts of our Volunteer Fire Department. Nome is a fine town. - N.L.M.-

Week of the Arctic to be held in Nome, Kotzebue, Barrow

The Institute of the North will host the 2014 Week of the Arctic next week in Nome, Kotzebue and Barrow.

The ION says that increased maritime traffic, international attention and new opportunities for development are three good reasons to understand and work toward safe, secure operations on land and off Alaska's Arctic coast, However, for Alaska's Arctic residents, there is so much more that must go into Arctic decision-making.

The Week of the Arctic will be a platform for community leaders, subject matter experts and interested stakeholders to learn about the Arctic while contributing to a growing list of priorities and perspectives. Throughout the week, presentations and interviews will be captured on video and in written reports. Topics include: Energy development in northern regions; collaborative approaches to science and research; local governance and communication; maritime response operations; food security; health and emerging leadership; preparation for the 2015 U.S. Chairmanship of the Arctic Council; business development and offshore development - risk mitigation and impact benefit.

The Week of the Arctic aims to educate Alaskans and deliver key insights and recommendations, provide clear guidelines for state and federal officials while promoting informed local decision-making.

The Nome events include an Alaska Arctic Policy Commission update at City Hall, a discussion about CDQs and fisheries infrastructure, Maritime Operations, Prevention and Ocean Observations for Navigation Safety and a federal listening session with high ranking officials: U.S. Special Representative for the Arctic Admiral Robert Papp; Rear Admiral Daniel Abel, District 17, U.S. Coast Guard; Ambassador David Balton, State Department; and Fran Ulmer, Advisor to the Secretary of State for Arctic Policy and Sci-

This session invites public testimony on a range of Arctic issues climate change, economic development, energy, the environment, and security - as the United States prepares to assume the chairmanship of the Arctic Council in 2015.

Unfazed by sanctions Rosneft presses on with oil drilling in Arctic

The Hill reports that US and European sanctions enacted to prevent American companies from working with Russia on offshore oil and gas development won't stop Russia's state oil company from drilling for oil in the Arctic.

Russian-owned Rosneft is working on an Arctic well with Exxon-Mobil Corp.

Last week Rosneft announced that it struck oil in Russia's part of the Arctic Ocean.

However, the sanctions mean that ExxonMobil must exit once the well is safely sealed. ExxonMobil provided money and expertise for the well and both would be needed to commercialize the oil discovery.

A Rosneft official told the news agency Bloomberg that if ExxonMobil had to leave, Rosneft would be able to carry on and find different partners not under similar restric-

EPA issues greenhouse gas

On Tuesday, the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency released its fourth year of Greenhouse Gas Reporting Program data. The EPA's data details greenhouse gas pollution trends and emissions broken down by industrial sector, geographic region and individual facilities. In 2013, reported emissions from large industrial facilities were 20 million metric tons higher than the prior year, driven largely by an increase in coal use for power generation.

"Climate change, fueled by greenhouse gas pollution, is threatening our health, our economy, and our way of life—increasing our risks from intense extreme weather, air pollution, drought and disease," said EPA Administrator Gina McCarthy.

The Greenhouse Gas Reporting Programcollects facility-level greenhouse gas data from major industrial sources across the United States, including power plants, oil and gas production and refining, iron and steel mills and landfills.

The program also collects data on the increasing production and consumption of hydrofluorocarbons (HFCs) predominantly used in refrigeration and air conditioning.

Over 8,000 large-emitters reported direct greenhouse gas emissions to the program in 2013, representing approximately 50 percent of total U.S. emissions. The data from these facilities show that in 2013: Power plants remained the largest source of U.S. greenhouse gas emissions, with over 1,550 facilities emitting over 2 billion metric tons of carbon dioxide, roughly 32 percent of total U.S. greenhouse gas pollution.Power plant emissions have declined by 9.8 percent since 2010, but there was an uptick in emissions of 13 million metric tons in 2013 due to an increased use of coal.

Petroleum and natural gas systems were the second largest stationary source, reporting 224 million metric tons of greenhouse gas emissions, a decrease of 1 percent from the previous year. Reported methane emissions from petroleum and natural gas systems sector have decreased by 12 percent since 2011, with the largest reductions coming from hydraulically fractured natural gas wells, which have decreased by 73 percent during that period.

Refineries were the third largest stationary source, reporting 177 million metric tons of greenhouse gas emissions, up 1.6 percent from the previous year.

Reported emissions from other large sources in the industrial and waste sectors increased by 7 million metric tons of greenhouse gas pollution, up 1 percent from 2012.

Rising seas

Climate Central, a scientific climate change website, reports that it just completed an analysis of worldwide exposure to sea level rise and coastal flooding.

It found that 147 to 216 million people live on land that will be below sea level or regular flood levels by the end of the century, assuming emissions of heat-trapping gases continue on their current trend. By far the largest group, 41 to 63 million people, live in China.

But even these figures may be two to three times too low, meaning as many as 650 million people may be threatened.. Comparing results for U.S. vulnerability using global data and state-of-the-art domestic data, they found that global elevation data led to major underestimates compared to modern U.S. elevation data, whereas global population data led to overestimates.

If the overall error factors calculated for the U.S. apply globally, then 300 to 650 million people live on land that will be submerged or exposed to chronic flooding, by 2100, under current emission trends believed the fire started in a first-floor apartment.

"I don't know how the fire started, but an investigation is ongoing. If it was arson, you're not just putting the occupants in danger, but you're putting the lives of 27 firefighters in danger," Johnson said. "They need to consider the danger to all those people and add that to the arson charges."

Acting Fire Chief Jimmy West Jr. told news organizations that he suspected that humans had a part in getting the fire going.

John O'Connor, who lives on the first floor, woke up and noticed smoke at the ceiling level.

"Then it came down all around me. I threw my clothes out the window and dived out in just my shorts. There was so much going on that nobody noticed me standing there like that without clothes and shoes," O'Connor said. "I saw a friend and asked him if I could borrow some shoes."

Over the weekend, Nome turned out with donations for the people who lost their clothes and living necessities.

Nome Baptist Church, Methodist Thrift Shop and other groups opened doors to donors who shared with the people who had no place to go and nothing to use for everyday activities. Bering Straits Native Corp., owners of the burned building, opened 10 rooms for the displaced people in the corporation's Aurora Inn hotel.

Jerald Brown of BSNC applauded the generosity of the Nome community nity.

"They had help from the Red Cross, Norton Sound Economic Development Corp., the Thrift Store, Alaska Commercial, the churches, a benefit concert, and other groups," he said. "People have rallied, It is very encouraging."

On Monday, Brown said the corporation had found other accommodations for the people in the four burned out apartments in other rentals in the BSNC portfolio. Brown said that more that 20 had been displaced, including at least seven children.

Two of the four apartments in the west end of the eight-unit building are charcoal, two are water-logged and damaged by smoke.

The remaining four apartments have had power and heat restored and should be available to occupants soon. An insurance adjuster had inspected the site Saturday, Sept. 27.

A damage figure is not yet available.

The department did a good job, Johnson said.

"It was a good save. We saved a major portion of the building that could have burned to the ground," he said. "We had no loss of life and no firefighters hurt to my knowledge." Some firefighters, exhausted, had to sit down with oxygen masks to rehab from energy loss.

Johnson credited training as responsible for the success of the department in containing the fire.

We practice at the training site on Center Creek Road and around town, as well as at the station. It all helps. This doesn't happen every day," he said. "When a fire does break out, you have to pull all your training and preparedness out of your reserves and put them into operation.

"It comes down to muscle memory after a while. You have to know about every situation and every piece of equipment and tool we have, about building structures, everything involved in a fire," Johnson said.

UPTHE SIDE—The blaze at Third Avenue and Moore Street kept firefighters running from 7 p.m. until after 9 p.m. with breakouts at every opportunity. Here it comes out and starts licking the southeast corner of the building.

CAUGHT—Chuck Fagerstrom, firefighter emeritus with over 40 years' experience on the fire department gets caught between two streams from hoses. Fagerstrom and other "graduates" of the department showed up to help out.

Nome man severely injured in crane accident

By Sandra L. Medearis

Bryce Warnke-Green, 25, left Nome on a medevac flight Sunday with serious back and neck injuries after a crane tipped over at the old asphalt plant at the intersection of Nome-Teller Hwy. and Dexter Bypass Road.

The crane tipped and the boom fell and crushed the cab of the flatbed truck Green was driving. The truck had a shipping container loaded on the bed.

Lloyd Gilman of Pro-West Contractors said he was driving the crane. He did not elaborate but said the accident was under investigation.

Jimmy West Jr. of Nome Search and Rescue said it appeared that the crane driver was getting ready to move into position to take a container off the truck.

"It was an unfortunate accident of being in the wrong place at the wrong time. I don't think that either driver saw the other because there were containers between them," West said, emphasizing that he had not been there when the crane went "It was very dark at 8:30 a.m. to 9 a.m. Sunday morning."

Labs can't confirm presence of oil on seal samples

By Diana Haecker

Last week, the Alaska Department of Environmental Conservation released preliminary results after examining skin and tissue samples from two seals harvested at Gambell, St. Lawrence Island. The samples tested negative for the presence of oil on the animals. However, when the hunters harvested the seals, they detected a dark oily substance on the coats of the animals and the stench of petroleum product emanating from the bodies.

The carcasses were discarded and not taken home for consumption.

Due to the lack of skin samples from the areas of possible oil contamination, the laboratory results didn't confirm what was obvious to the hunters.

The hunters were able to sample organs and blubber before notifying the authorities.

The samples were sent to Nome, where UAF Marine Advisory Program agent Gay Sheffield received them. Samples that contained even the smallest amount of hide were sent on to the U.S. Coast Guard and the Alaska Dept. of Environmental Conservation. The Dept. of Environmental Conservation ran the first test to find out whether or not the samples showed any sign of a petroleum product.

NO

They did not.

If the tests had confirmed oil on the animals, the U.S. Coast Guard would have then pursued further testing to find out what kind of petroleum product it is and where it came from.

ADEC's State on-scene coordinator Tom DeRuyter said the best information on the oiled seals has come from hunters and the tissue samples of the seals themselves.

However, SGS, the state's laboratory in Anchorage, had needed skin samples from the oiled areas.

"The point is, we need a standardized protocol to collect samples," DeRuyter said.

The DEC is working with the U.S. Coast Guard and the UAF Marine Advisory Program to develop such a protocol, DeRuyter said, which would be communicated to hunters in the rural coastal communities

Although the results did not confirm oil, DeRuyter assured that the ADEC is not "done with it." The results of the laboratory will be peer reviewed, which can take some time.

The remaining organ and blubber samples were sent to the North Slope Borough and the National Marine Fisheries Service to test for the presence or levels of polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, for short PAHs.

NO

NO

PAHs are pollutants found in fossil fuels and are often linked to oil spills. These tests were also done on samples from three discolored seals harvested near Gambell and Shishmaref during 2012 and confirmed those seals had been exposed to oil.

"These recent organ and blubber samples were sent to the North Slope Borough as part of a collaborative effort with MAP, Eskimo Walrus Commission, Kawerak, and NMFS," said MAP agent Gay Sheffield. "This coastal effort is to better understand toxin levels in seals fouled by oil and what that may mean for seal health and ultimately, the people and communities that rely on seals," she explained.

Laboratory work on the organ and blubber samples will begin in October.

"If you find or harvest wildlife that is discolored or oiled, please take a photo and call UAF-MAP 434-1149 or 1-855 443-2397; Kawerak Subsistence Program 443-4265, or the Eskimo Walrus Commission 443-4380. If it's oiled we would like the whole animal to be sent. We will make arrangements to get the affected animal into Nome," said Sheffield. "Oiled wildlife is an injury to all of us in the Bering Strait region."

Laura Samuelson honored for 17 years as museum director

By Diana Haecker

At noon on last Friday, the City of Nome threw a retirement party for Carrie M. McLain Memorial Museum Director Laura Samuelson. Samuelson is set to retire on Sept. 30 after 17 years at the helm of Over hoers d'oeuvres and pizza, City of Nome staff joined Museum and Library commissioners Cussy Kauer, Howard Farley and his wife Julie, John Handeland and Jake Kenick to reminisce with Samuelson and her husband Gary Samuelson.

Cussy Kauer brought up the time when she and Laura were bushwhacking around Anvil Mountain trying to find a BLM marker that was in the proximity of where the Lucky Swedes first found gold.

Jake Kenick recited a poem he composed in her honor. City Manager Josie Bahnke expressed her admiration for Samuelson's passion for Nome's history and the museum.

"I caught you in great moments, telling a Nome story to somebody or maintaining perfection in chaos,"

The word 'perfection' touched on a nerve with John Handeland, who thanked Laura for working hard on so many different projects, including the centennial celebrations in 2000. "Like Cussy, these gals keep you on your toes," Handeland said.

He spoke of having to redo, reprint, move and re-arrange things until projects were deemed to meet Laura's satisfaction. "Everything had to be perfect so that the image of Nome is portrayed nicely," Handeland said.

Among the many things Samuelson contributed to the museum were efforts to preserve oral historic accounts of Nome stories, working with news media and assuring good publicity for Nome, pushing for a new place to house the museum and of evacuating artifacts out of the building during fall storms. "How many times did you move things out of the museum and back? At least four times, right?" remarked Handeland.

The museum is tucked in the basement of a small building on Front Street. It bursts at the seams. During Samuelson's leadership, it became apparent that a new building was needed to house the ever-growing CMMM collection.

Samuelson spearheaded the effort to secure money and Legislative grants for the new Richard Foster Building, which will house the CMMM, the Kegoayah Kozga Library and Kawerak's Beringia Cultural Center.

Construction is soon to begin. The new museum is slated to open in the summer of 2016.

The City presented the Samuelsons with gift certificates for Alaska Airlines flights. "Fly, but come back," remarked Howard Farley dryly.

Laura Samuelson had a good laugh when she opened her retirement card envelope and found it contained the same card she had just gave her husband Gary, who is also retiring on Sept. 30 from his longtime job at GCI.

"There must be only one retirement card in Nome," she said laugh-

Judge rules to allow Walker, Mallot to join campaigns

On Friday, Sept. 26, Anchorage Superior Court Judge John Suddock ruled that Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell and the Division of Elections acted appropriately in adopting an emergency regulation to allow the Walker-Mallott unity ticket.

Independent gubernatorial candidate Bill Walker and Democrat Byron Mallot joined their campaigns after the state primary election in August. Polls at the time revealed that neither Walker nor Mallot would have the necessary votes to unseat incumbent Governor Sean Parnell and so came the decision to reshuffle the candidates for the upcoming gubernatorial elections. Byron Mallot won the Democratic primary but resigned from the race, as did partynominated Democrat Hollis French, who ran for Lt. Governor. Mallot is now running for Lt. Governor leaving the race for Governor between Walker and Sean Parnell.

Walker is running as an independent candidate and as such was not part of the candidate line-up in the primary race, in which registered party members vote for their candidates of choice.

Since there is no statute in place to deal with post-primary candidate reorganization, Judge Suddock found that Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell and the Division of Elections properly issued the emergency regulation.

The emergency regulation allowed Byron Mallott to run for Lt.

Governor as a petition candidate without having to collect 3,100 signatures required by statute to appear on the 'No Party' ticket with Bill

Judge Suddock concluded that there was a valid emergency under the Administrative Procedure Act, and that the Division of Elections correctly followed administrative precedent and Attorney General opinions to fill the statutory vacuum with a regulation to treat party and non-party candidates alike in allowing for a replacement.

Judge Suddock noted that since 1982 there has been no permanent regulation dealing with similar election situations.

"Fifteen legislatures have not resolved this election nomination conflict allowing a No Party candidate to reshuffle the deck after a primary election," said plaintiff Steve Strait's press release commenting on the rul-

"I have decided not to appeal this result to the Supreme Court of Alaska," Strait said. "This will allow the lieutenant governor and the Legislature to deal with this problem of disenfranchising over 42,000 voters in a future legislative session as suggested by Judge Suddock.

"If the voters of the state of Alaska disapprove, they'll sweep you out the door," Judge Suddock noted in oral arguments.

"As intervenors in the case, we are entitled to seek attorney's fees from Mr. Strait, but we're not going to do that," commented Bill Walker. 'We're pleased this exercise is finished and are eager to devote our full attention to the important issues of the campaign. This lawsuit is an example of partisan politics at its worst."

Lt. Governor Mead Treadwell said in a press release that the public is invited to submit comments on the Division of Election's proposal to create a permanent regulation governing replacement of a withdrawn lieutenant governor candidate nominated by petition, since there is currently no such permanent procedure in place.

Kawerak board hears updates on regional issues

By Diana Haecker

The Kawerak Board of Directors convened in Nome last week and heard about important issues affecting the region and its communities.

Kawerak legal counsel John Bioff drew a picture of the legal landscape regarding the creation of tribal courts in the region.

Bioff and Alaska Legal Services attorney Sarah Carver informed the board that now is the time to keep advocating for tribal courts because recent developments are encouraging a change in the way justice is administered in Alaska.

Tribal Courts

Uncovering the dismal state of public safety in rural Alaska is the first step to initiate a change and a federal report shone light on Alaska's issues. Last year's scathing Indian Law and Order Commission report, which dedicated a whole chapter to Alaska, criticized the State of Alaska's approach to tribal courts, public safety and access to justice in rural Alaska. One of several solutions would be to recognize sovereignty even in the administration of justice - albeit just for misdemeanors – in tribal courts. While the federal government recognizes tribes on a government-to-government basis, the state of Alaska is resisting the idea of tribal sovereignty and, with that, the administration of tribal courts. However, Bioff said that recent Alaska Supreme Court decisions have been favorable to tribal courts.

The Alaska Safe Families and Villages Act was introduced in Congress in August 2013. It has passed out of committee with the recommendation for further consideration by the U.S. Senate. The bill encourage the State of Alaska "to enter into intergovernmental agreements with Indian tribes in the State relating to the enforcement of certain State laws by Indian tribes, to improve the quality of life in rural Alaska, to reduce alcohol and drug abuse, and for other purposes." If the bill passes as written, it will recognize tribal court authority and concurrent civil jurisdiction over child protection, domestic violence, alcohol and drug related offenses.

Bioff summarized cases that could be dealt with in tribal courts: domestic violence protective orders, juvenile matters and child protection cases. Bioff said he has partnered with the non-profit Alaska Legal Services Corporation in Nome as a resource to help tribal councils – if they wish – to guide them through the establishment of tribal courts. ALSC is an Alaska-wide organization that can help tribes to revise tribal ordinances, to develop tribal courts and to train tribal court judges and staff, ALSC lawyer Sarah Carver said.

She added that tribal courts could offer a more humane solution to juvenile delinquents. A tribal court could change the behavior by offering creative "punishment" like ordering a juvenile offender to spend time with an Elder to help, instead of sending the kids to Nome or out of state. "When tribal courts are involved, kids don't act up as much anymore," she said.

Bioff encouraged the board members to take the information to their tribal councils so they can mull over the idea of setting up a tribal court. "We can walk you through the pros and cons of your decision to set up a tribal court," Carver added. For example, a tribal court team with ALSC advises 56 tribes in the Association of Village Council Presidents region around Bethel on the concepts of due process, on ethical codes, on training of tribal court staff and on going through tribal codes.

Kawerak Chairman Robert Keith of Elim confirmed the need to address the issue, but noted that funding was the crux of the matter. "We found the lack of funding a bit of a roadblock," he said.

Kawerak President Melanie Bahnke said that Kawerak would wait for direction from the tribes before pursuing funding.

Beringia Center of Culture and Science

Amy Russell-Jamgochian updated the board on the status of the Beringia Center of Culture and Science. The Center will be integrated in the Richard Foster Building, currently under construction, at the end of Steadman Street. Kawerak entered into an agreement with the City of Nome to lease space for an annual rent payment of $115,000. Russell-Jamgochian explained that renting from the City's Richard Foster Building would be more cost effective than striking out on their own to build a cultural center. This summer, the Rasmuson Foundation awarded a $1.3 million grant and Norton Sound Development Corporation donated $1.5 million for the construction of the Kawerak part of the Richard Foster Building.

With funding for the construction secured, the program's attention has turned to raising funds for an operating budget to staff the cultural center, to fund exhibits, collections and equipment. The program has already secured funding for a preserving bird skin parka making skills.

Russell-Jamgochian presented a slide with the floor plan of the Richard Foster Building. The entrance leads to a round center of the space, which will be used for functions, community and educational events. "We will focus on educational programs," Russell-Jamgochian said. Hence, she dubbed the circular space the "class room" space, complete with an overhead lamp shaped like a skin drum. An irregular corner is envisioned to offer quiet space. An exhibit room is separate from the circular space and will hold display cases for exhibits.

Russell-Jamgochian said that next steps will be to meet with the cultural advisors to hold a collections planning meeting. Also, they program needs to develop an exhibit plan, an operating budget and a business plan. She added there is a need for additional staffing to oversee the project management as the project moves into the construction and then into installation phases.

The City of Nome expects the grand opening of the Richard Foster Building to be in the summer of 2016

Towarak also said he'd be retiring from the FSB, but didn't announce when he plans to do so.

Kawerak chairman Robert Keith commented that effects of climate change need to be taken into consideration by game and fish management. "We need to start looking to see long term plans through the lens of climate change," said Keith.

Community reports

Board members spoke of the changes they see in their communities. Robert Keith spoke of new species moving into the area like spider crabs. People have seen grasshoppers in Kotzebue, Deering and Teller. Wales residents noticed black ants in their community. Johnson Eningowuk reported a poor oogruk hunting season this year. The Shishmaref village report also pointed out that spring hunting was not good due to poor weather and ice conditions.

Gambell's Merlin Koonooka said that again this year ice did not cooperate and that the walrus spring hunt was very bad. However, ĥe also reported that the hunters had good success hunting seals. Rubble ice blocked the hunters' access to open water and thus the whale and walrus spring migration went by Gambell without much hunting success He reported a strange occurrence this winter, namely the complete absence of mice this winter. Diomede reports said that hunting was poor as they community harvested only one walrus and a few seals this year. Weather and an ammunition shortage were the culprits for the dismal hunting

Wales reported the completion of trail staking between Brevig Mission and Wales. The Brevig Mission report noted that the State of Alaska requested to do a comprehensive site characterization investigation of contaminated sites at the USCG Loran Station at Port Clarence. The effort is in support of assessing the viability of Port Clarence and Point Spencer as an Arctic deep-draft port site

Shishmaref reports that seven new homes were built by the Bering Strait Regional Housing Authority. The Shishmaref clinic is being renovated and completion is slated for the end of December 2014. Shishmaref hunters also report bad spring hunting, good fishing in the summer and adequate berry picking during a short window of time.

The Village of Solomon reported that they received a NSEDC outside entity funding grant, which was used to fund the Okitkon shelter project. The shelter cabin, including wood stove and stocked driftwood, is placed at mile 31 of the Nome-Council Highway. Before the road closes, the Council will place a satellite phone in the cabin.

Savoonga reports that reindeer herders are working with UAF on the experimental reindeer processing plant in the hopes that the future may bring a reindeer processing plant to Savoonga to commercially package reindeer meat.

King Island Community reports that only two hunters went on a walrus hunt this year.

In good news, the KIC received a state grant and other grant requests are pending for an extension of the King Island Community building to add on a community hall for gathering and dancing practices.

The KIC finished staking the trail from Nome to Cape Woolley.

Some sections still need to be completed by adding reflective markers to the posts. The King Island drummers and dancers were busy this summer traveling to Wainright, Wales and last weekend to Teller for dance festivals.

Gambell reported the U.S. Coast Guard recently visited the community and brought block and tackle donated from Point Lay to Gambell.

TRAIL MARKERS— The King Island Community has almost finished a trail staking project from Nome to Cape Woolley. For the most part, stakes are in but reflectors must be added.

School Board takes up overdue lunch bills

By Kristine McRae

At their work session last Tuesday, the Nome Board of Education considered some possible paths the school district might take to recoup thousands of dollars in delinquent lunch bills. In total, the district is owed $12,500 in overdue lunch fees. District business manager Paula Coffman shared a cost summary with board members: 119 families owe a balance below $10, totaling $643.65; sixty families owe between $10 and $50, totaling $1343.40. "Fifty families owe more than $50 in delinquent lunch fees, totaling $10,504.00, which is the bulk of the of the delinquent lunch accounts," Coffman said. The board was first alerted to the excessive debt two years ago. At that time they discussed ways to provide lunch alternatives for those students whose families had hardship in paying the Board member Barb Amarok was dubious about the district's intentions to collect the funds after so much time has passed. "I think we should have been more diligent about collecting the money and qualifying families [for free lunches]," Amarok said, "because there really are families that are in need and maybe those are some of the ones that owe quite a bit of Board member Jennifer Reader commented that it is the board's responsibility to attempt to collect the monies, given that such a deficit takes money away from other programs that benefit the students. And weighing in for the last time as a member of the school board, Barb Nickels added, "We have to balance our budget and get the money in order to qualify for some of our programs," referencing eligibility parameters set by some federal grants. The board left it to district administration as to the specifics of how they will seek payments. Strategies could include mailing certified letters and employing a collection agency, which could result in court action or garnished Permanent Fund Dividends. Coffman is checking with other districts to see how they have gone about collecting overdue

In other news, the board is prioritizing Capital Improvement Projects for the upcoming legislative session. Superintendent Steve Gast shared this year's plan for project prioritization. "This year we're going back for reimbursement for the new lighting and the gym floor, which totaled $260,000," Gast said. Each year the state allots a certain amount of funding to the district for large structural and maintenance costs. The district would like to recoup the money for the completed projects. Currently the district is finishing work on the heat, ventilation, and air conditioning (HVAC) system and the sprinkler system, both of which are fully funded.

Other funding priorities Gast mentioned include the restroom renovation at the Anvil City Science Academy, primary electrical services at Nome-Beltz, and the replacement of siding and roofing on the maintenance building.

The meeting was the last for longtime school board member and past president Barb Nickels. Running unopposed for Nickels' seat is Brandy Arrington, who will officially join the board at the October 14 meeting.

Nanooks boys claim 10th regional cross country title in 11 years, earning trip to state championships

By Keith Conger

Nome Results

By looking at the top 10 finishers in the boys race at the Region 1 North cross country running championships in Noorvik last Saturday, one might think that the Barrow Whalers would be booking their tickets to Anchorage right now to attend the state championships next weekend. They did, after all, place first, second, and fifth

At the same time, the Nome-Beltz Nanooks were able to place the Hoogendorn brothers — Wilson in third, and Oliver in sixth — in the top ten. To see the real story behind how the Nanooks were able to reclaim the regional championship, one had to travel further down the results list

Due to the strength of the Nanooks 3rd through 5th runners - freshman Harrison Moore, senior James Jorgenson ,and junior Leif Erikson - the team was able to place high enough ahead of the Whaler's 4th and 5th runners to escape with a 42-47 point victory.

This was the 10th regional team trophy for the Nanooks boys in the past 11 years, losing only to Kotzebue last season after spending nearly a decade as the top regional team. This feat was even more impressive given the fact that Region 1 North had more teams participate than any other region in the entire state of Alaska.

Besides spirited efforts by all the Nanooks runners, there were two major factors that contributed to the team reclaiming the title from the Huskies.

The first factor was the emergence of senior James Jorgenson, who was running his first high school race of the year. Jorgenson, who placed thirteenth in Noorvik, started the season late, but worked his way up onto the travel squad by means of a stellar time trial during the Open Race at the Nanook Invitational.

Team co-captain Oliver Hoogendorn said of his teammate, "he just decided to run in the middle of the season. And (in Noorvik) he kind of saved us."

The elder Hoogendorn did as much saving as anyone on the team. Hoogendorn was forced to find creative ways to keep his conditioning up this year while nursing a muscle injury that kept him from running for well over half the season.

"I biked every day to practice, during practice, and from practice," explained Hoogendorn. "I got as many miles in as I could." He has only been back practicing with the team for about three weeks.

Hoogendorn's sixth-place finish in only his second race of the year was remarkable, and a testament to the hundreds of off-season miles he put into training. In this race, he had a faster time than the five other runners who beat him only two weeks ago at the Nome Invitational.

The Alaska School Activities Association's qualification rules for attending the state championships allow seven runners from both the boys and girls division winning teams to race at the state meet. Next weekend, the Hoogendorn brothers, Moore, Jorgenson, and Erikson will be joined by junior James Horner and freshman Jamie Yi when they take on the rest of the small Alaskan schools in the 1A, 2A, 3A race at Bartlett High School.

The girl's division top six was nearly identical to the boy's top ten with the Lady Whalers placing first, second, and fifth, and the Nanooks placing third and sixth. That top end of the order for Barrow helped them qualify as a team for the state meet when they beat the Lady Nanooks by one point, 32 - 33.

Third-place finisher junior Christine Buffas, who was returning after a two-week absence due to a leg injury, paced Nome. The Nanooks also got a top ten performance from sophomore Ivory Okleasik, who placed sixth. This was the first race of the year for Okleasik, who too was coming off a leg injury.

ASAA rules also allow for the all other runners in the top 10 to qualify for state, so Buffas and Okleasik will be joined by two teammates in Anchorage next weekend: seventhplace finisher sophomore Bianca Trowbridge, and eighth place finisher freshman Mary Fiskeaux.

When asked about the race and course conditions, Hoogendorn said, "it was well below freezing. It was really cold. The course went through trees, through mud, and on the beach. I loved the course."

Nanooks coach Crystal Tobuk is excited to be taking the team back next weekend to race on the Bartlett course where they started their season. She is hoping the familiarity with the trail will bring about great results.

BSSD Results

Two small schools runners from the Bering Strait School District were able to crack the top ten in their divisional races in Noorvik. Jayden Wilson of the Unalakleet Wolfpack had an impressive fourth place finish in the boys division, while Anikan Paniptchuk placed ninth in the girl's race.

The top BSSD boy's team was the Unalakleet Wolfpack placing fifth. The Teller Aqluks, led by Jarod Topkok, placed sixth as a team, while the Elim Eagles, led by Ralph Saccheus, ended up in seventh place.

WESTERN REGION NORTH CHAMPIONS – The Barrow Whalers placed first and second in the boys race at the regional meet in Noorvik, and had three runners in the top 10 to the Nome's two. Despite these facts, the Nanooks' number three through five runners placed higher that the Whalers, helping Nome to the team trophy and a trip to the state championships in Anchorage. NORTHERN EXPOSURE – Nome-Beltz runners junior Christine Buffas and freshman Mary Fiskeaux (middle of the picture) take off in the girl's division of the Western Region North Regional cross-country race in Noorvik on Saturday. The two helped their team to a second place finish, 1 point behind the gals from Barrow. The girls, along with fellow top ten finishers junior Ivory Okleasik, and sophomore Bianca Trowbridge will be headed to Bartlett High in Anchorage next weekend to attend the state championships.

PAWS of Nome, short for People for Animal Welfare and Safety, held its first annual Dog Jog on Saturday to raise funds for Nome's animals in need. Five participants came out to show their support for the cause on the cold rainy day. Despite the weather, everyone finished happy.

Nils Hahn and John Bioff competed for first place with their canine companions and it was quite a race! Nils and six of his well-trained sled dogs had a narrow win over John and his dachshund mix Max. April Shepherd (along with her daughter), Mary Wojtyna and Melissa all finished the jog with their happy dogs. PAWS thanks the following people for buying t-shirts in support of the jog: Iris Wieler, Santa Paul and Jackie Hrabok-Leppajarvi. All participants received a t-shirt, a bandana for their dogs, a medal for finishing and refreshments at the finish.

Co-sponsoring the event was the Nome Animal House, Bering Sea Lions Club and AK Body LLC.

Nome netters settle for split with Kotzebue

By Keith Conger

The Nome-Beltz varsity volleyball girls were back in their own gym after starting the season on the road with losses to both the Kotzebue Huskies and the Barrow Whalers. The oft-used "must win" cliche describes how much the Lady Nanooks team needed a victory against the regional rival Huskies at home.

The Huskies, who entered Friday night's contest 4 - 0 in regional match play, kept the Nanooks' crowd quiet at the beginning of the first set by marching out to a 17 – 11 lead. Desperately needing a spark, the Nanooks turned to their junior captain Rayne Lie, whose two blocked balls helped her team claw their way back into the set.

After a well placed tip by junior Allaryce Agloinga, a kill by senior Jane Tidwell, and an serving ace by senior Rene Merchant, the Nanooks were able to come back to tie at 21 -

For the next 12 serves neither team could string two consecutive points together, and the set was extended well past the regulation 25 points. It was finally a timely serving ace by sophomore Kim Clark that gave the Nanooks a 28 – 26 victory in the first set of the five set

Both teams kept the scoring close during the second set, with Kotzebue establishing the biggest lead at 20 -16. Again, the Nanooks relied on their serving, which included aces by both Clark and senior Alyssa Bushey, to tie the score at 21 - 21. The Huskies, however, finished out the set 25 - 23.

The Nanooks' trend of falling behind early continued in set three as the Nome team started out down 6-1.

As if this type of situation were her cue, Lie again asserted her will with a kill shot from her right side hitting spot to bring her team to 6-8. Lie followed up on her front row heroics when she rotated to the back row to serve. Two straight aces, followed by a string of hard serves, and Lie had helped her team score seven straight points, thus turning their two-point deficit into a 15 - 8 ad-

With the score 18 - 10, serving specialist senior Bailey Immingan-Carpenter delivered consecutive aces to bring the Nanooks to 20 – 10. At that point, the young Clark emerged from her volleyball cocoon with two straight kill shots and a serving ace to help her team win the set 25 - 12, capping a 24 – 6 point run.

In the fourth set, the Nanooks, using the highly energized crowd as a "7th girl" on the court, broke their trend of coming from behind. Bushey came to serve with her team leading 10 - 5, and was buoyed by kill shots from junior Kalani Suemai and Tidwell. Nome's tallest player added three straight serving aces to the offensive efforts of her teammates, and by the time she was done delivering the ball, she had extended the Nanook lead to 17 - 5.

Another ace by Merchant along with the hardest serve of the night, coming from Immingan- Carpenter on match point, and the Nanooks found themselves closing out the set 25 - 9, thus securing their first match win of the season.

The victory displayed the style of play coach Lucas Frost believes in. Where as many smaller, rural teams have a style that emphasizes merely keeping the ball in play, Frost teaches the girls how to focus on an attack game. This type of play can take some time to develop, but could prove to be the difference maker by the time the regional tournament

After the match, Lie acknowledged that Friday's offensive attack was set in place by solid game basics, "we have worked constantly on serve and serve receive and we have really gained a lot of confidence."

Nome was intent on following up on the previous night's success, by holding off the Huskies in game one of the Saturday morning match. Tidwell continued to be a force at the net with two big blocks. Freshman Jillian Stettenbenz showed no nerves when she came to the line with the score tied at 19 - 19, promptly serving her team to set point. The Nanooks were able to hold off the Huskies to win 25 - 21.

Set two was more reminiscent of the first set of Friday night, as the teams see-sawed their way to 23 -

23. The Huskies, however, were able to tie the match up at 1 set apiece with a 26 – 24 victory.

A huge defensive dig by Lie cemented the Nanooks' lead at 22 - 8 in set three. The Nanooks seemed to have put themselves in good position to end out the match by winning the third set 25 - 17.

At that point, Kotzebue was able to regain some of its swagger. Due to freshman setter Calia Sien participating at the regional running meet in Noorvik this weekend, the Huskies were using senior back-up setter Paeton Schaeffer, who is their usual attacking outside hitter. This was her first weekend at the new po-

During the third set Schaeffer began getting more comfortable guiding the Huskies' offense. Her teammates were able to withstand a barrage of hard hits by Clark, as the northern girls grabbed a 25 - 14 victory. This would set up a fifth, and deciding, set to 15 points.

The Nanooks kept the last set close at 11 - 9, but eventually lost the final set 15 - 11, and the match 3 sets

Nome Junior Varsity

The Kotzebue Junior Varsity team travelled to play the Nome Junior

The Nome JV girls won a tight first set 26 – 24 on Friday night, using clutch late set serving by senior Rena Sparks. They followed that up with a dominating second set at 25 -11, using two kills by Stettenbenz, and serving aces by junior Tehya Tucker and sophomore Sonja Hukill.

The young Nanooks found themselves at 20 - 19 in the third set when freshman Emily Pomrenke stepped up to serve. Pomrenke delivered five straight points to close out a 25 – 19 set. The 3 sets to 0 victory is the Nanooks JV squad's second match victory over Kotzebue this season.

The younger Huskies mirrored the results of their older teammates on Saturday, beating the Nanooks JV team in straight sets.

WELCOME TO TELLER (left) — Jazzlyn Garnie, as part of the Teller dancers and singers, welcomed visiting dance groups and spectators to the 10th Teller Cultural Festival by kicking off a night of dancing on Fri-

Teller celebrates 10th Cultural Festival

By Diana Haecker

Last weekend, the community of Teller doubled its size populationwise when dance groups and visitors from Nome, Gambell, Shishmaref, Koyuk and White Mountain arrived on Friday afternoon for a weekend filled with dancing, visiting and cultural activities.

For ten years, Charlene Isabell, the tribal coordinator for Teller, and Cora Ablowaluk, tribal coordinator for Mary's Igloo, have been the driving forces behind the annual Teller Cultural Festival. While the drums were sounding in the gym, Isabell and Ablowaluk took a quick break in the Teller school's kitchen after they cooked for and organized a huge potluck that took place on Saturday evening. They had just finished peeling and cutting eight pounds of onions, 30 pounds of potatoes and cooking a whole reindeer. They organized the logistics and travel of the King Island and St. Lawrence Island dance group from Nome, and dance groups from Gambell, Shishmaref, Koyuk and White Mountain. Invitations included a $1,000 scholarship for air travel. Bering Air also helped with special fares to get the dancers to Teller.

Once in Teller, the dancers were put up in the school and looked to a weekend filled with dancing. On Friday, seven dance groups performed until after midnight.

On Saturday, dancing lasted all night long until the wee hours on Sunday morning.

The Teller Cultural Festival began in 2004. Back then, Isabell remembers, they actually had two festivals because an invited group from Uelen, Chukotka, was held up by weather. When they finally made it to Teller a couple of weeks later, all other dance groups came back to Teller to celebrate the dance festival

Since 2004, the people of Teller look forward to fall time, when all the summer's fishing, gathering and moose hunting is done and the community can come together with friends from other villages to visit and dance, Isabell said.

Over the years, the Teller Cultural Festival grew to host dance groups from all over the region.

On Friday night, the gym was packed, with 395 people who signed in, but Isabell estimates that about 500 people were there to watch and dance.

The combined King Island and St. Lawrence Island drummers and dancers from Nome. were the biggest dance group. They performed a vast variety of dances, including parts of the Wolf Dance, the twin dance, walrus and raven dances. The crowd went wild when Vince Pikonganna and his wife Betsy got up and performed a lovely dance.

Koyuk brought a young dance group that restarted Eskimo dancing a few years ago. This year, Shishmaref-raised Mary Huntington became Koyuk school's principal and infused her extensive dancing and drumming knowledge to the Koyuk dance group.

A young dance group from White Mountain also showed what they've learned.

The Gambell Singers and Dancers brought nearly everybody to the dance floor during invitational dances.

A roar went through the audience when Anders Apassingok Sr. and Anders Booshu performed.

Anders Booshu performed.

On Saturday afternoon, the festival continued with dance workshops where dance groups taught their dances and songs to participants and other dance groups. In the cafeteria, kids and women gathered for beading activities. The Teller IGAP program demonstrated how to prepare an environmentally friendly all-purpose cleaner. Kaylee Schaafsma with the Bering Sea Women's Group gave out information about women's safety and available resources in case of an emergency. In the library, two tribal healers with the Norton Sound Health Corporation demonstrated their work of muscle relaxation and massaging.

After the potluck, the tables were cleared and put away and room was made for a night of dancing in the gym. The grand finale concluded at 4:55 a.m. with snacks for the dancers and lots of memories made to carry them forward to the next cultural celebration.

NSHC moves into 21st century with EHR

Staff at NSHC are gearing up for the second largest transition in the hospital's history (the first being the move into the new facility): the implementation of Electronic Health Records. EHR will change record keeping and documentation from paper files to digital records that can be shared instantaneously between providers, clinics, and hospital departments. "It's an exciting change for us," explained Phil Hofstetter, NSCH Vice President, during a radio appearance with KNOM. "Getting everyone from village clinics and the hospital into Electronic Health Records will help us overcome the challenges of distance, will improve communication between departments. The intent is that we will be able to provide better quality service and continuity of care. We will be able to red flag certain cases, improve management of care. EHR gives providers instant access to information, when time is of the essence with health care. It's all good stuff."

Hofstetter, along with hospital president Angie Gorn, and Liz Coler, Clinical Informatics Nurse, appeared at KNOM on Friday to inform Nomeites about the impending implementation of EHR on October 1. "We would love to have the EHR staff here today, but they are busy at the hospital, learning the system and preparing for when we go live," explained Hofstetter. "It's a lengthy process, and it won't be a gradual transition. At midnight on October 1, we flip the switch." Staff will be working through the night so that patients arriving at 7 a.m. that morning will be the first to experience the use of EHR during their visits. "Patients will see staff using computers at check in, nurses and providers may be wheeling in WOW's- workstations on wheels. They will be taking your vitals and inputting the information into the computer during the visit," said Coler. NSHC will retain the paper charts it currently maintains until the transition to EHR is complete and past data has been recorded into the system.

The benefits of EHR to patient care is immense. Not only will records be more current and complete, any provider can access the records at any location, and at any time. Providers will also be able to view records simultaneously, meaning that a village health aide and a primary care doctor in Nome will be able to collaborate about patient care as if they were side by side. NSHC has opted to use CERNER, a health record system currently in use by Anchorage Native Medical Center. This will provide greater continuity of care for the large number of patients that are referred to ANMC for specialized and long-term care by providers at NSHC.

Patients can expect to see some new faces and increased traffic at NSHC through the transition. CERNER and ANMC staff are on site to provide technical support, while emergency room and Fast Track teams will be double staffed. "Speed and accuracy will be the end result, but not the immediate experience," said Coler. "We want to be transparent. Other organizations have experienced delays with implementing EHR. It takes time for staff to learn the system, to log in, to learn keystrokes. And it will be happening all at once, including the things we can't predict, such as computers that won't turn on, printers that don't work, and so on. Your face to face time with the doctors will be the same. Your level of care will be the same, but the overall appointment may take more time. We will still give you our full attention, but we require your patience." In order to prepare for unexpected glitches, NSHC has set up a "Command Center", with trained super-users available by phone or in person to providers encountering difficulties with the system. The super-users have visited village clinics in person and will be at located at NSHC, available to provide assistance around the clock to everyone within the system.

NSHC staff warned that fewer appointment slots will be available in the primary care clinic during the transition period, to allow for the extra time that appointments may take. Patients with urgent and acute issues will be seen in the Fast Track or Emergency Department. "We ask people who need less urgent care to put off appointments for a few weeks," said Coler. "There is a learning curve for us, and there is anxiety among both the community and providers about EHR," commented Hofstetter. "It's not like picking up an iPhone." Coler emphasized that patient care remain the focus of the visit, over learning to use EHR. "Be reassured that patient care is our top priority. The record can wait. The patient comes first."

President Angie Gorn informed patients that complaints and issues may be brought to the hospital's attention through the patient advocacy office located on the first floor near the security desk. Patients were also invited to communicate with compliance officer Faren Smith.

Hofstetter explained that the pharmacy department and the dental offices already use EHR, with the dental office using a different system than CERNER. Hofstetter acknowledged that the pharmacy had recently undergone a workflow change that caused some confusion and difficulty for patients. "We didn't communicate with the public very well," admitted Hofstetter. "We adopted a system that ANMC is using, and we thought it would be a simple change." Rather than filling prescription requests and refills and waiting for patients to pick them up, the prescriptions would be filled when the patients arrived at the pharmacy, so that pharmacist counseling could be provided. "The data shows that with this change, the average wait time is the same or lower for patients," said Hofstetter. "However, we didn't anticipate the confusion and difficulty it would cause, so we switched it back. Most people don't realize that the pharmacy fills up to 800 prescriptions daily. It's very complex." Hofstetter said he wasn't sure whether the pharmacy would try to implement the workflow change again in the future. "Reducing wait time is still the overall goal. If we do make any changes, we will definitely communicate better next time.' NSHC staff will use the learning experience to help anticipate issues that may arise with the transition to HER and will communicate frequently with the community throughout the

On another note, Gorn also announced that NSHC has funding available for higher education students enrolled in two year programs, or completing four year programs, who are interested in future employment at NSHC. "This funding is available for all kinds of employment fields- it can be health care, but it's not limited to that. The hospital needs accountants, administrators, maintenance workers, health care leadership. We will support any schooling needed to be successful in the career field of vour choice. We know the value of growing our own," said Gorn. "We just ask that you commit to at least two years of working at NSHC." Students interested in applying for the program are encouraged to contact the Education Coordinator, Belinda Maddingly.

William David "Bill" Droke

William David "Bill" Droke died peacefully on September 21, 2014 while at home and in the comfort of

Bill was born in La Grande, Oregon on August 21, 1946 to George Silas "Jake" and Berniece Droke. He attended elementary school in Union, Oregon and graduated high school in Olympia, Washington. Bill had a strong interest in drafting and wished to attend college to pursue these studies. However, Uncle Sam had other plans for his education and suggested that the U.S. Army needed him. Bill, always one to consider all options, made the decision to enlist with the United States Navy where he found the best opportunity to see the world. He served as a sonar tech while aboard the Aircraft Carrier USS America. Bill circumnavigated the globe twice in the late 1960's seeing the Mediterranean and Southeast Asia among many other worldwide locations.

In February of 1966, Bill Married Patricia Johnson. They were blessed with three children: Veronica, Kathy, and William D. Droke, Jr. Bill would later marry Cindy, who brought into his life Lisa and Lori Droke. Never content, Bill would later find his true soul mate, Bobby, who he married in 1990.

After the Navy, Bill returned to Washington state where he worked in the electronics field and eventually joined the Safeway store chain as a meat cutter. This fateful career change would open the door to Nome, Alaska where he moved his family in the dead of winter 1976 to work for the Northern Commercial Company grocery store.

In the late 1970s, Bill also worked in the building trade, remodeling homes. This allowed for him to use his artful skills both as a draftsman and a builder. He would later return to the grocery store industry where he managed the Stop-Shop-and-Save and Ookviq stores in Nome. For a short time, he worked as a bartender at his favorite watering hole "the Bering Sea Saloon" where his steady hand and friendly, humorous personality made him a big hit. Bill was hired by the Nome Police Department as a dispatcher in August 1994. His naturally level-headed disposition gained him the trust and loyalty of the community that he loved so much. He would proudly serve the City of Nome for 14 years before retiring as Sergeant in 2008.

Bill had the ability to get along well with most everyone. He was a man of many talents and had a good eye for his countless artistic interests. He penned a cartoon strip about a family of walruses, "Nomer and Norma", that ran in the Nome Bering Straights newspaper from 1976 through 1978. It is said he drew up the plans for the Nome VFW club on a bar napkin. He was a gifted artist and sign-maker and had a signature packed up the many boxes of their beloved Christmas décor and shipped off all of their belongings to Oregon. Bobby would not survive to make the voyage.

While still in Nome, Bill would eventually meet and fall for Anita Cruise who joined him on the move to Tygh Valley in 2010. Bill and Anita enjoyed his retirement for several "superb" years together as Bill would say, and they wed in 2014 shortly before his death. Anita was devoted to caring for Bill and did not leave his side throughout the dura-style that is immediately recognizable among his many creations. Bill was a die-hard Seattle Seahawks fan from the original franchise, when the Seahawks weren't so lovable; a fact that he was proud of and liked to joke about with his friends, all of whom will remember the ever-present smoldering Camel no-filter and MGD bottle at his side.

After his retirement, the plan was for Bill and his beloved wife Bobby to withdraw from Nome to enjoy and attend NASCAR races while retired in the Tygh Valley, Oregon area. In preparation for the big move, they sold their timber home, filled their dredge buckets with locally collected 'rocks" (Bill's term of endearment for Bobby's collection of local rose quartz and other natural tidbits), tion of his illness. He died peacefully in her arms

Bill is survived by brothers John Droke, Dean Droke and Harvey West; children Veronica Carr, Kathy Droke, Lori Campbell, Marcy Newberry Simpson, and Dan Newberry of Oregon, as well as more than 30 grandchildren and great-grandchildren plus countless nieces, nephews and cousins. He was preceded in death by his son William David Droke Jr., father Jake Droke, mother Berniece Reisen, wife Barbara "Bobby" Droke, and daughter Lisa Bill's ashes will be interred in the Union Cemetery in Union, Oregon as he wished. Services will be announced at a later time.
